Political debate shows ugly face

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — As Israeli and Palestinian negotiators edge closer to agreements on expanding autonomy to the West Bank, Israel's political leaders have been warned that they themselves may be in danger.

Two leading newspapers reported last week that the government is treating seriously threats to both Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Yediot Aharanot reported that personal protection has been stepped up for Rabin and Peres, while Ha'aretz quoted Police Minister Moshe Shahal as saying he had reliable information on far-right activists intending to attack cabinet ministers.

The government has approached leaders on the right in an effort to stem the escalation of heated rhetoric, media reports said, but details of those talks remained sketchy.

Included in talks with Rabin and Peres was opposition Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who refused to divulge the content of the meetings.

But Netanyahu appealed for tolerance toward the government and by the government.

He argued that he "never needed any special security alerts to oppose labelling Rabin a 'traitor' or a 'murderer.'

"For months, I have strenuously condemned such epithets and I continue to do so. Voicing legitimate opposition to the government's policies should continue vigorously, but within the limits of the law."

But, he continued, "Rabin must cease his ongoing incitement against what he calls the right. He must learn to accept the democratic rules of the game, within which opposition to his policies is not tantamount to treason, subversion or collusion with the enemy.

"As for the sanctimonious left, I wish only to ask why it kept so silent when for months, demonstrators dogged the late prime minister Menachem Begin, calling him a murderer."

Not everyone was moved by the reports of threats to Labor politicians.

Former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir said the concern over the safety of Rabin and Peres is "a transparent manoeuvre, a provocation and an attempt by the government to incite the public against the opposition.

"There are no facts to back these so-called news reports of threats against the prime minister. This is all an attempt to divert attention from this government's failed and disastrous policies," Shamir said in a statement.

"But this attempt is dangerous because it may plant precisely such ideas in some demented mind. There are crazies everywhere, and when one of them sought to assassinate Ronald Reagan, no one claimed that the Democratic Party in the United States was behind it. For this government, however, no matter what happens, it's the Likud's doing."

'Call us if you need help'

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — While Michal Raveh lay in a hospital bed recovering from injuries received in the recent bus bombing in Jerusalem, she was visited by a stranger who slipped a card in her hand.

"Call us if you need help," it read and was signed AVNET.

Hundreds of Israelis have received similar cards in the last year and a half ever since a rabbi in Gush Katif decided to establish an organization to help the growing number of victims of terrorist attacks and their families.

AVNET, an acronym for the Hebrew phrase Avi Nifga'ay Terror (the father of victims of terror), is a non-profit association set up by Rabbi Yosef El-Nekave.

"The name is inspired by a passage in the book of psalms that praises him who is a father to orphans and widows," explains Rabbi El-Nekave, who is the rabbi of Gush Katif, the bloc of Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip.

The group is not political, he is quick to point out. (The organization is not to be confused with Victims of Terror, a right-wing movement that coordinates anti-government protests.) Instead AVNET is involved in the personal plight of victims: helping a widow make a bar mitzvah for her son, inviting her to spend a holiday at a kibbutz or organizing a summer camp for her children.

In this respect, AVNET strives to supplement the assistance that the state provides to families of terror victims, (which includes coverage of hospital bills, living allowances, professional retraining and referrals to psychologists and social workers.)

Feature

"The state offers financial help. But that's not enough," says Esther Pechina, whose husband remains physically handicapped and brain damaged after a terrorist attack in Gush Katif three years ago.

"We need more than a cheque in the mail," explains Sylvia Dahari, another widow from Gush Katif, who was instrumental in establishing AVNET. Dahari was left to raise six children on her own after her husband, Avigdor, was killed by a terrorist near their home in 1989. For years, Dahari dealt with her pain privately, until she happened to meet several other widows spending Chanukah at a hotel in Gush Katif. They had all been invited there by the hotel manager and his family.

"It was the first time since my loss that anyone had bothered to invite me to spend a holiday with them," recalls Dahari. After attending a Torah lesson at the hotel given by Rabbi El-Nekave, Dahari approached the rabbi and asked him whether he was doing anything to ease the plight of the community's widows and orphans, many of them the families of men who had been killed by terrorists. The rabbi called her the next morning.

"He said he was so disturbed by our conversation that he couldn't sleep all night," she recalls.

Shul Site Defaced

VANCOUVER — The site of a proposed new building for Har El Congregation in North Vancouver was defaced by vandals on August 25. The words "Juden Raus," and a huge swastika were painted on a hoarding surrounding the property.

Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region chair Michael Elterman called on the Vancouver police department to "take swift action in investigating and apprehending the perpetrators."

ISRAEL

IDF Soldier Killed

JERUSALEM — An Israel Defence Force soldier was killed in an accident during an exercise along the northern border on August 27, the army reported.

Sgt. Dotan Barak, 20, was killed when an army vehicle slid down an embankment and hit him.

The army is investigating.

Gay Appeal Denied

JERUSALEM — A Defence Ministry appeals committee last week turned down a gay man's claim that as a long-term companion of an army colonel, he was entitled to the same benefits the army extends to spouses of deceased soldiers.

Adir Steiner, 28, had asked to be eligible for the benefits, after his partner of eight years, Col. Doron Maisel, a senior army doctor, died of cancer in 1991.

The committee ruled that army regulations never intended to grant benefits to partners of the same sex.

Editor Charged

JERUSALEM — The editor-in-chief of the Israeli daily Ma'ariv and its chief of security were indicted last month on charges of illegal wiretapping and interfering with a police investigation.

A date for the hearings of editor Ofer Nimrodi and security chief David Ronen will be determined soon.

The charges state Nimrodi hired private detectives to wiretap telephones and fax machines of senior editorial executives at a competing newspaper, Yediot Achronot.

Nimrodi was also charged with ordering wiretaps on the telephones of his own employees.

Activists Expelled

TEL AVIV — Israel last week expelled 10 Greenpeace activists after they staged anti-nuclear protests outside the French and Chinese embassies in Tel Aviv.

The protesters — all foreign — chained themselves to fences and scaffolding, spray-painted anti-nuclear slogans and tried to block embassy entrances in demonstrations against the two countries' nuclear testing.

The 10, including two Americans, were briefly detained and then returned to the Greenpeace ship Altar anchored off the Israeli coast, said police spokesperson Eric Bar-Chen.

Three Israeli protesters were also detained and released on bail, he said. The foreign protesters were told not to return to Israel, but the ship was allowed to remain in Israeli waters, he said.

Rabbis Support Peace

JERUSALEM — A delegation of six New York rabbis arrived in Jerusalem last week for three days of meetings intended to show government officials that Americans support the peace process.

"They are coming to Israel to break the image of American Jews as extremists," said an official at Israel's consulate in New York, which organized the trip.

The delegation represents the New York Board of Rabbis. With 800 members, the board is one of the largest rabbinic organizations in the United States, and has Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist rabbis as members.

"While we are appalled by the bloody killings of Jews on buses or streets, we still believe the mainstream voice of American Jewry supports the peace process," the rabbis said in a statement.

CyberCards

JERUSALEM — For the first time in 5756 years, it will be possible to order Rosh Hashanah greeting cards via the Internet and have them automatically sent anywhere in the world.

The New Year's greetings may be ordered by logging on to the WorldWide Web at http://www.netvision.net.il/Reshut Hadoar/. Customers may order any of nine different card types (a minimum of 20 is required).

They then fill in the names and addresses of the recipients and Israel's Postal Authority will stamp and mail them.

Cost is $1.50 per card in Israel and $2.50 when sent abroad. Payment can be made directly through the computer via credit card number or by mailing a cheque.

WORLD

Graves Defaced

PRAGUE — Vandals last month daubed 11 gravestones with swastikas and the letters "SS" in the Jewish cemetery of Klatovy in western Bohemia, according to the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

No arrests have been made by Czech Republic police in connection with the incident, thought to have occurred between August 7 and 13.

Rabbis disagree over Mideast peace process

"Sense of confusion permeates"

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A memorial service for Israeli terror victims took on a political tone last week when two Orthodox rabbis offered divergent interpretations on the issue of relinquishing part of the land of Israel.

The disagreement came unexpectedly, when Rabbi Mark Dratch rose to his feet and addressed several hundred people in the sanctuary at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, where he is spiritual leader.

He spoke immediately after Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Vaad Harabonim (Orthodox Council), offered a Torah interpretation that suggested the land of Israel must always remain under Jewish control.

Though he was not scheduled to address the memorial service, Rabbi Dratch said he felt obliged to make some remarks.

Rabbi Dratch went on to cite a number of rabbis who argue that land can be relinquished in return for peace.

In his keynote remarks, Rabbi Stern had dismissed suggestions that peace will result from the transfer of land to the Palestinians and the improvement of their economic condition.

Citing Ramban's commentary on a Torah passage, Rabbi Stern said the land of Israel "will never accept our enemies ... They may live there, but it will be in a desert, in an unproductive strip of land.

"Vaad does not have official position"

"The Torah message is that Eretz Yisrael was meant to be forever in the hands of the Jewish people. It was never meant for others," Rabbi Stern concluded.

Rabbi Stern expressed "grief and shock at the deaths of innocent Jews killed on the buses on the way to work" and for the hundreds of others killed or maimed by terrorists.

"A sense of confusion permeates the Jewish community, even those who support the treaties and negotiations. We are confused that a Jewish government is prepared to abandon 140,000 of its brothers and sisters," he said in reference to Jews living in Judea and Samaria (the West Bank).

We are confused that the government would send police out to beat peaceful demonstrators."

Rabbi Dratch later told The CJN the "Vaad Harabonim does not have an official position" on the peace talks.

He said the evening should have been dedicated to prayer only, adding that some rabbis would disagree with the views expressed by Rabbi Stern.

In an interview, the memorial's chair, Kurt Rothschild, said he did not view Rabbi Stern's comments as inappropriate. "[His] remarks were not political in nature. They're an interpretation of what the Torah considers the law in regards to Eretz Yisrael.

"In my opinion, it was a religious discussion and not a matter of political activism," Rothschild, chair of the World Mizrachi Organization, said.

The memorial program was jointly sponsored by the Vaad Harabonim and the Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

Prior to the memorial service, a Canadian supporter of Women in Green, a group opposed to the transfer of land, handed out a two-sided sheet in the shul's lobby that criticized the upcoming Israel/PLO agreement to withdraw from West Bank territory.

It also blamed the government for a violent crackdown on peaceful protestors from the "Nationalist Camp."

Shul to fete Bitterman

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past 18 years, Morris Bitterman's life has been interwoven with that of Beth Tikvah Congregation. Next week the synagogue will fete him on his retirement.

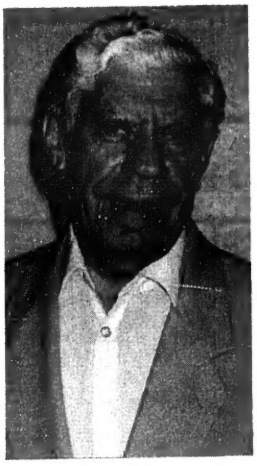
As ritual director for the past 18 years, Bitterman would open the synagogue doors at 7 a.m., lead daily services, give divrei Torah, teach bar and bat mitzvah lessons and participate in life cycle events such as weddings and baby namings.

In the past decade, he began lecturing about his experiences during and after the Holocaust, when he tried to immigrate to Palestine in 1947 on board the ill-fated Exodus. Although he was forced to return to Europe, along with about 5,000 other passengers, he returned to fight in Israel's War of Independence.

A quiet-spoken man with thick white hair and a gentle manner, Bitterman decided to speak out because "no one lives forever. This should not be forgotten. As long as we remember, Holocaust deniers haven't got a chance."

Born in 1926 in Kroscienko, a Polish resort town, Bitterman celebrated his bar mitzvah a mere six months before war broke out in 1939.

The pre-war Jewish community in Kroscienko consisted of about 60 families, all of whom were religious, Bitterman said. His family owned a knitting mill and a restaurant catering to Jewish vacationers. One of 10 children, Bitterman attended Jewish school after his day at public school.



Morris Bitterman

Along with an older brother, he was sent to a work camp at the age of 16. He had lied about his age and was put to work building roads. "I passed the first test," he said.

His brother took ill and was hospitalized, never to be seen again. The rest of the family perished at Treblinka. Bitterman was moved through seven camps before the war was over.

Alone after liberation, he studied English, Hebrew and German, then joined a "kibbutz" in Germany to prepare for aliyah.

In 1947, he left for Palestine on the Exodus, an overcrowded wooden vessel that was attacked by British war ships just outside Haifa. Eventually the passengers were taken to detention camps in Hamburg, Germany.

Bitterman finally reached his destination in time to see Israel become a state. He spent 1½ years in the army.

"I happened to be taken to the Palmach, and I went to the front lines," he recalls. "It was a good feeling to be in the army in Israel."

Bitterman came to Canada in 1952 to visit a cousin, and ended up staying. He and his wife Frances were married in 1956 and had two sons. Their happy marriage ended with her death from cancer in 1990.

Bitterman, who had had experience teaching teenage orphans on the kibbutz in Germany, was certified as a Hebrew teacher at Toronto's Midrasha l'Morim. Prior to joining Beth Tikvah, he worked as a Hebrew teacher in Hamilton.

Now that he is retired, he continues to share his Jewish knowledge with a small number of students.

Batsheva Dance Company celebrates 30th anniversary

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The internationally renowned Batsheva Dance Company of Israel is celebrating its 30th anniversary.

The troupe, established in 1964 by Baroness Batsheva de Rothschild, will appear Sept. 14 at the Bluma Appel Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre of the Arts, under auspices of the Canada-Israel Cultural Fundation.

Dancer-choreographer Martha Graham, who worked personally with the company, was its most pervasive influence, amd with the appointment of 43-year-old Israeli-born choreographer Ohad Naharin as artisic director, the Batsheva Dance Company has soared to the forefront of contemporary dance. It has also benefited from the influx of professional Russian dancers.

Helping to launch the Canadian celebration of Jerusalem 3000, the company will also appear in Montreal at Place des Arts Sept. 19 and the National Arts Centre in Ottawa Sept. 21.

The performance in Toronto will be followed by a reception sponsored by the Ford Motor Company of Canada. Tickets for the concert are $100 and a tax-deductible receipt for the allowable amount will be issued.

The Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation encourages and supports the peforming and visual arts in Israel.

In 1990, Batsheva entered a new era under Naharin, who assembled a group of compelling dancers with international flavor and a strong individual style.

Batsheva is now a focal meeting point for artists of all disciplines. Lighting, set and costume designers, composers and filmmakers have all found a haven for unique collaborations. More than 130,000 people around the world see the Company's distinctly unique and daring repertory every year.

Karen Green and Ronald Bresler are concert co-chairs. For information, call 921-2103.

Getting ahead in Hollywood

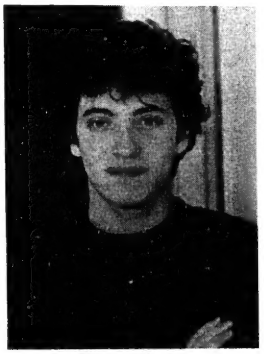
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — At 31, former Torontonian Larry Guterman is taking Hollywood by storm.

Having just completed the master's program in film at the University of Southern California (USC), Guterman has already written an episode for the American television series, Tales From the Crypt. Both Paramount and TriStar have hired him to write feature films and his name is under consideration at 20th Century Fox.

As part of the USC master's program, Guterman wrote and directed Headless!, a 35-minute black comedy that tells the story of an elderly couple in the Arizona desert who sell mail-order shrunken heads. The film was shown to the filmmaker's family, friends and professional associates recently during two private screenings at a downtown Toronto sound studio.

Although Headless! has the look of a slick production costing $500,000 or more, it actually cost only $55,000 to make, since most of those who participated in production, including actor Eddie Albert, worked for free. Guterman says he was able to get a script to Albert, who volunteered himself for a part.



Larry Guterman

"There are so many talented people to choose from in Los Angeles and they are willing to work for free because they don't know what will come out of it," says Guterman, who showed would-be participants a film prospectus that included a glowing letter of reference from American film director Robert Zemeckis (Forrest Gump, Back to the Future, Roger Rabbit).

Headless! is a remarkable cinematic debut by a promising artist who shows a keen understanding and control of the medium. His parents, Monty and Blema Mazin of North York, recall that Larry was interested in film even as a child.

Having earned an undergraduate degree in physics from Harvard, Guterman also studied film animation at Sheridan College in Toronto. He credits his years of Hebrew day school in Toronto with helping him survive and flourish in the topsy-turvy world of Los Angeles. (Another former Hebrew day school student in Toronto, Andrew Eisen, worked on Guterman's film as editor and associate producer.)

"Hebrew school gives you a foot in both camps," Guterman says. "It instils strong family and educational values in you that allow you to look at the world with a certain anchored perspective. And it puts you in an environment with a lot of very creative people who strive to excel."

The grandson of a rabbi, Guterman recently became a member of the American Screenwriters Guild.

Couple celebrates their 60th

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "That's my girlfriend," says perennial kibbitzer Morris Kornbloom, indicating his wife Billie.

The Kornblooms were married on Sept. 8, 1935, in a small shul on Manning Avenue. Morris was 20 and Billie was 21.

Every year he buys her a box of chocolates on the anniversary of the day they met. As a teenager, Toronto-born Billie Shatz sold pop and cigarettes from a cart at 179 John St., and Morris, a young immigrant from Chmelnik, Poland, worked upstairs at Perfect Leather making leather jackets.

"He bought more Cokes than anybody else," recalls Billie fondly.

"Why did I marry her? She gave me credit," deadpans Morris.

"Now the truth comes out," Billie laughs.

Kibbitzing aside, the secret to a happy marriage is remembering that it's a fifty-fifty proposition, says Morris. "We tried to help each other. We had disagreements, but when one was mad, the other kept quiet. The next day, we sat down and talked it over."

According to Billie, the secret is "just love. That's the main thing."

Their courtship had its ups and downs. Morris' parents were against him marrying before his older sister, but after two years he summoned his courage and told them that he was going to get married.

The young couple moved in with Billie's mother on D'Arcy Street and lived there until after the arrival of their three children, Maxine (Lieberman) Judy (Taub) and Allan. The family of five moved into a new house in North York and became charter members of Adath Israel Congregation.

Morris spent time organizing B'nai Brith Canada's Wilson Heights lodge, and Billie was involved with B'nai Brith Women, becoming their top fundraiser in 1972.

When the children were grown, Billie worked with Morris at J & M Sport Shop, the retail store he bought in the late 1950s.

"They're a really warm, devoted couple," says Maxine.

Their family — which has grown to include 10 grandchildren, and one great-grandchild, with two more on the way — has planned a party to celebrate their 60th anniversary.

Morris and Billie Kornbloom — then and now.

Limelight falls on Friedman as honoree at ORT gala

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Helen Friedman has tried to keep a low profile.

But she will be in the limelight on Sept. 14, as the honoree at ORT's 21st Golden Circle Gala Luncheon at the home of Judy and Sheldon Godfrey.

The money raised will provide scholarships at the ORT School of Engineering in Jerusalem.

Guest speaker Sylvia Ostry is the chair of the Centre for International Studies at the University of Toronto, chancellor of the University of Waterloo and chair of the National Council of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs.

Helen Friedman

Commitment, dedication

"Helen defines the word commitment and dedication in our Jewish community," says Ruth Druxerman, co-chair of the 1995 luncheon with Libby Zimmerman.

Friedman says she learned tzedakah and commitment from her parents, Rose and Israel (Srule) Weinberg, who were active in the Ostrovtzer Synagogue on Cecil Street and in Jewish education.

Friedman met her husband, Jack, when she was 16. She had been accepted into a nursing school in New Jersey, but says, "I became a homemaker instead ... I did what everyone else did in those days."

She became a volunteer at the National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto Section, and then organized fundraising events such as a lecture series at the Royal Ontario Museum, a furniture auction, concerts, house tours and bus trips.

She has been involved with State of Israel Bonds, Tel Aviv University, Mount Sinai Hospital, Hadassah-WIZO as well as ORT. She generously opens her home for many fundraising events.

Friedman is concerned about volunteerism. "We have lost many women volunteers, women who are now in the work force ... It is hard to impart to the younger people the dedication to volunteerism of our generation. We did it as a profession," she says.

The Friedmans are members of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. They have four children, Ira Michael, Susan, Karen and Deborah, and eight grandchildren.

Importance of example

There were disturbing reports last week in at least two Israeli newspapers, Yediot Aharonot and Ha'aretz, that the police had received reliable intelligence warnings about possible attacks on the lives of prominent cabinet ministers, most notably Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. As a result of this information, they recommended that security be tightened for Rabin and Peres.

Inasmuch as the information was made public by Minister of Police Moshe Shahal, we can only assume he was being forthright. However, he brought forward no further details. In fact, the accounts in the papers were sketchy and somewhat contradictory.

The report in Yediot Aharanot emphasized that the main fear on the part of security forces related to the possibility that an unstable individual would succumb to overwhelming anger and frustration, and violently direct an uncontrollable rage at government officials.

The report in Ha'aretz, on the other hand, strongly suggested that the government had obtained hard evidence of a plan by members of the far right fringe to harm political leaders.

Despite the inconsistencies in the two stories, the news is alarming. For there are precedents in Jewish history, unfortunately, of violence by one Jew against another. The most recent example was the death in 1982 of Emil Grunzweig, a Peace Now supporter, at the hands of Yoni Avrushmi, a supporter of the far political right.

It is a severe understatement to write that the peace process is evoking strong emotions and straining relations among the Jewish people. The rhetoric on both sides of the debate has often been intemperate and inflammatory. But the language of the debate, if not its temper and mood, must now be returned to the moderate middle. There must be no demonization of individuals or personalization of larger issues, lest it lead to tragedy and grief.

To his credit, Benjamim Netanyahu, the leader of the Opposition, has publicly condemned the use of extremist and extreme language against the proponents of the peace process. Other leaders, such as President Ezer Weizman, have also been approached to speak out against extremism. And they too have done so.

In addition to sound political judgment, the hour also demands sound political example. Example is one of the key responsibilities of public leadership. It is one of the ways to best ensure the safety of the body politic and the guardianship of the democratic process .

In Quebec, enumerate

In this issue of The CJN, staff reporter David Lazarus writes about the Jewish community of Quebec. He has written an excellent, upbeat essay which dwells honestly on the past and looks realistically and optimistically to the future. How ironic that this issue should fall during the six-day period from Sept. 5 to 10 inclusive, which the government of Quebec has set aside for the enumeration of voters on a permanent voters list. This list will also be used in the referendum that rumors have pegged for Oct. 30.

To be eligible to vote in the referendum, Quebecers must be enumerated. It is thus our duty to remind all eligible Quebecers, whether inside or outside the province, to register for the vote. More important, though, than our duty to inform, is the voters' duty to vote. But first one must be enumerated.

Sokoloff loved and served Israel

Together with all the friends of Yiddish in our Jewish community, we mourn the passing of Julius Sokoloff. He was an intellectual blessed with a sense of humor, a man of high integrity with unique abilities, who gained the love and respect of all segments of our Jewish community regardless of political differences. His priority in life was the State of Israel. He grew up in the youth organization of the Zionist Movement — Dror Habonim. Already as a very young man he served in the Bricha, an illegal Israeli group that was instrumental in helping the survivors of the Shoah to immigrate to Israel, which was ruled by England at that time.

In Toronto, Sokoloff was elected many times to the highest office of the United Zionist Movement. Thanks to his unusual abilities, in all the organizations in which he served, people looked up to him, to his wisdom in solving the most complicated problems of our times, especially in regard to Israel, the land that he loved so much. Deeply concerned about Jewish education, he was one of a few dreamers that brought to life the unique Bialik School that serves hundreds of Jewish children, teaching them the great values of Judaism.

A great admirer of Yiddish literature and the Yiddish language, he successfully fought to bring Yiddish classes into Bialik School. For the same reason, as a lover of Yiddish, he joined the Yiddish Culture Group in the Bernard Betel Centre, which he chaired. Under his leadership for the last six years, the number of participants has doubled.

There is no substitute for people like Julius Sokoloff. He will be greatly missed by all of us.

Leah Posluns theatre as it once was

It was with enormous sadness that I read your classified announcement "Beautiful Theatre Available" (August 24 issue), which referred to the Leah Posluns Theatre in North York.

I had the privilege of performing at the Leah Posluns during its inaugural season in 1977, under the direction of Reva Stern. As an audience member, I experienced several excellent productions there.

The Leah Posluns is unquestionably one of the finest theatrical spaces in Metropolitan Toronto. To see such a worthwhile and promising facility reduced to a tiny classified ad is indeed heartbreaking.

Religious leaders fail to speak out

Recent reports in the press indicated that the Rwandan genocide included at worst the active involvement of churches and at best a passivity in the face of monstrous inhuman behaviour. This is only one of many recent incidents which bring into question the abrogation of the responsibility of religious leaders and the fact that they are silenced for political and other unacceptable reasons. Witness the ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia. While there is the occasional outcry, there should be universal condemnation from church leaders.

When a Polish priest utters vile anti-Semitic remarks in the presence of the Polish president, not only is there a failure to criticize him, but there is absolute silence from the Pope. When terrorists blow up innocent Israeli civilians in buses, there is nary a comment from Muslim religious leaders, perhaps for fear of political repercussions. Is all of this evidence of a waning of the power and authority of religion or is it merely an indication that the words of religious leaders would have little or no impact because the perpetrators of ethnic cleansing, racial slaughter and murderous terrorism operate under a code devoid of moral censure?

If religious leaders do not speak out is it any wonder that political leaders are content with mere posturing, empty words of remorse and little or no effort to seriously check and challenge crimes against humanity wherever they occur? It is sad and depressing that moral bankruptcy has infected not only our political leaders but those to whom we look for divine and spiritual guidance.

Searching for mother's friend

I am trying to locate a long-lost friend of my mother, Shlomo Shteinmetz (in Czechoslovakia known as Slomik). We were told recently there is the chance that he is presently living in either the Toronto or Montreal area.

My mother's name is Esther Fleishman and the last time she saw him was in 1946 in a DP Camp in Traunstein, near Salzberg. He was with his father at the time.

He should be in his mid to late 60s.

Do you know Fred and Erica Ileo?

In spite of the fact that 50 years have passed since World War II, family loss and dispersal are still problems facing some of us.

My family originated in Przemysl, Eastern Poland. During the war, my aunt Antonina Bien (later Ileo), one of 12 siblings, lived in France, and later emigrated to Canada with her two children, Freddy and Erica.

Following the death of my aunt, I lost contact with my cousins. Maybe somebody could help me to find Fred Ileo, a musician, and Erica. Their last address was 114 York Rd., Beaconsfield, Que.

Perspectives

'Bilingual, resilient and vibrant'

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

While Canada's politicians may continue to squabble over the pros and cons of recognizing Quebec as a "distinct" society, for the province's venerable Jewish community, seeing itself as distinct has pretty much been a case of stating the obvious.

It's a uniqueness that can't be gauged by numbers alone. Unlike other communities in Canada, 20 per cent of the Jewish population of 101,000 is Sephardi. And the intermarriage rate is among the lowest in the Diaspora — about six per cent.

For Quebec Jewry, distinctiveness has also been expressed through the fact that it has spent 236 years adapting to a largely French-Catholic culture while managing to successfully preserve its religious and cultural heritage and integrate fully into the life of the province.

In fact, it may very well have been the Catholic Church's past omnipresent and at times oppressive influence — combined with a spurt of nationalist and Church-inspired anti-Semitism during the 1930s — that spurred the Jewish community into developing one of the most well-organized, elaborate, structured and self-protective networks of religious and social insitutions in the Diaspora.

The Quebec Jewish community has faced and continues to face enormous challenges, The CJN was told during a series of interviews, including an aging population, a high proportion of poor, the need to preserve a stable financial base, political uncertainty and maintaining the vitality of the Jewish day school system and health care institutions.

But it is also a community invariably characterized as bilingual, resilient and vibrant.

The community, they said, remains among North America's most strongly traditionalist and cohesive; and it is starting to see the light at the end of the tunnel, following more than 20 years of perceptible decline due to demographic shifts.

The loss of population experienced over that period — in no small part due to the departure of young people — has been recouped by a new generation of immigrants, many of them Russian, by a burgeoning chassidic population and by former Quebecers moving back to the province.

A widely held view is that, while in the immediate future the number of elderly will continue to increase, the Jewish community, through the natural process of attrition and the continuing influx of immigrants, will rejuvenate.

The next generation will integrate fully into the community and contribute to it, just as generations of immigrants did before.

"There has been a sense of angst," suggests Jim Torczyner, co-author of an exhaustive demographic survey of the Quebec Jewish community based on the 1991 Canadian census.

"But the Jewish community here, like Jewish communities throughout history, has shown enormous resilience.

"They change over time in their demography and aspirations, but they survive, adapt and endure."

The Quebec Jewish community, now situated almost exclusively in Montreal, has endured since 1759, the year of the British conquest of New France.

Among the conquerors was Aaron Hart, a British soldier and the most prominent of Quebec's founding Jewish settlers, who lived in Trois Rivieres.

Other founding families, also British Jews said to be of Spanish-Portuguese extraction (although there is a debate over whether Hart and other founding families were Sephardim, as is widely held, or Ashkenazim) included the Davids, Franks, Josephs, Judahs and Solomons, who lived in Montreal.

Quebec Jews, however, did not win their civil rights until 1832, 20 years after one of Hart's son, Ezekiel,. elected twice as a deputy for Trois Rivieres to the Quebec legislature, was denied the right to take his seat because he was Jewish.

Montreal quickly became the centre of Jewish community life.

Canada's oldest still existing congregation is the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, founded as the Shearit Israel in the 1840s, when the community numbered just over 100. It was led by community leader Abraham de Sola for 35 years.

The second half of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th saw waves of Ashkenazi immigrants from Germany, Poland, Russia and Romania. Fleeing persecution, they swept into the city and raised the Jewish population by thousands. The first Ashkenzazi synagogue in Montreal was the Shaar Hashomayim.

During the 1900s and 1910s, the Jewish population topped 10,000 and the community began to develop in earnest its vast network of religious, social, educational, charitable and political institutions. The most prominent of the latter was the Canadian Jewish Congress, established in 1919.

The last large waves of immigrants were comprised of thousands of Holocaust survivors (still the highest proportion on the continent) in the late 1940s and thousands of Sephardi Jews from North Africa, who arrived in Montreal in the early 1960s.

The once-vibrant Quebec City Jewish community, while still maintaining a synagogue, has dwindled to a handful of families. A small Jewish community in Sherbrooke was forced to close its synagogue a decade ago.

Ste. Agathe, in the Laurentian mountains about an hour's drive north of Montreal, has a flourishing synagogue, many of its members Montrealers with country homes.

It is now estimated that no more than 2,000 Quebec Jews live outside the Montreal area.

According to Torczyner's study and a subsequent five-part study prepared by the FEDERATION CJA community planning department demographer Charles Shahar, both based on the 1991 census, the Montreal Jewish community has its work cut out for it on several fronts.

Over one-third of the community was not born in Montreal. One-quarter is over age 65. Since the population base is larger than previously thought, the proportion of children receiving some form of Jewish education is 55 per cent, not 70 per cent, as previously thought, and provincial funding to Jewish schools has been declining over time while the demand for community "scholarship" funding has increased.

As well, the community will be getting older (especially in the 75-plus age group) before it gets younger again. Twenty-thousand Montreal Jews are poor, with one-quarter of them relying on community agencies for support. Single parent families have risen by 29 per cent over the last decade. Key productive age groups make up a smaller proportion of the Jewish community than in the general population. Interdating is thought to be up.

And with all this, the annual FEDERATION CJA campaign has been essentially flat over the last several years. To find enough funds for priority areas, 53 cents of every campaign-donated dollar (compared to the majority of each dollar going to Israel in the past) now stays in Montreal, while many agencies have had their budgets pared.

Maxyne Finkelstein, FEDERATION CJA's director of community planning, said despite these challenges, the community has the situation in hand and has every reason to believe it will continue to flourish.

"I think the people of Montreal feel very secure and good," she said. "There are concerns, but it has tremendous potential.

"I think the psychology of people moving away has moved behind us."

The demand for Jewish educuation, she said, is on the rise and Jewish health care insitutions have remained "intact."

Groups like ProMontreal and YAD are keeping the younger generation living and working in Montreal, while immigrants will comprise a future source of fully bilingual, younger and fully productive members.

The federation, she said, is also becoming more bilingual and "user-friendly" for francophone Jews.

Sephardi Jews are becoming more involved in federation power structures and its agencies, said community-planning assistant director Daniel Amar.

Some Sephardi leaders see this as part of a deliberate integration campaign that could lead to the dismantling of thriving, autonomous Sephardi institutions, but Amar said, "It is not a question of integrating, but of being able to work more closely with the Sephardi community."

Torczyner believes the community will bounce back, but he also believes that if not for the number of Jewish immigrants coming to Montreal (one in seven Montreal Jews arrived between 1971 and 1991), the community "would be in serious decline."

One of his main concerns is the fact that 39 per cent of Montreal Jews are not in the labor force, compared to 33 per cent of the general population.

He is also worried that if the government erodes the social safety net, the burden will fall more than ever on the community to pick up the slack.

On the plus side, Torczyner is heartened by the continued "high level of identification and economic success in Quebec."

Still, Montreal is no longer the centre of Jewish life in Canada. "The power," Torczyner said, "is shifting to Toronto."

Morton Weinfeld, a sociologist at McGill University, said the Montreal Jewish community remains "as vibrant and culturally diverse as any in North America, its insitutions particularly strong."

He is impressed by the "robustness" of its Orthodox segment, adding that the demographic changes "are mitigated by high levels of Jewish commitment that remain a living legacy of strong Jewish investment."

Affirmative action in Israel

A significant amendment to Israel's Public Sector Employment Law recently passed by the Knesset went largely unnoticed. Political and security preoccupations overshadowed the debate on an affirmative action provision in favor of women employees in the civil service. The amendment is aimed at correcting the underrepresentation of women in senior positions (assistant deputy minister and up, in Canadian terms) in government ministries and government-owned corporations. The law now gives preference to members of the gender that is underrepresented at those levels in the public sector.

By Shira Herzog

In North America, affirmative action — or employment equity — is not a new concept, and it is highly controversial. In their best interpretation and implementation, these programs are intended to redress an imbalance in the representation of groups who are theoretically equal, but who in practice experience discrimination. At their worst, they perpetuate the image of the preferred groups as inferior and the impression that hiring and promotions are offered on the basis of gender or ethnicity rather than merit. Nevertheless, in the United States, affirmative action programs for women and minorities have transformed the landscape in academe and several professions.

While in the United States and Canada legislated affirmative action programs are on the wane, in Israel the trend is strengthening. Last year, over 40 new civil service positions were targeted for members of the country's Arab minority.

In 1993, the Knesset passed an amendment to the law governing boards of directors of government corporations. That amendment required cabinet ministers appointing directors to such boards to give preference to women candidates "until such time" as women are appropriately represented. One year later, there were still only 52 women directors on government-appointed boards (six per cent of all directors).

Nevertheless, the law has already had some unusual ramifications. Responding to an appeal from the Israel Women's Network, the High Court of Justice recently overruled the appointments of three male directors to the boards of the Port Authority and the Israel Refineries, on the grounds that the finance and energy ministers, who had made the appointments, had not sought out qualified women for these positions. The issue was not the qualifications of the proposed male candidates, but rather their gender.

The more recent legislation has its critics and supporters among both women and men. Few argue with the facts. Women have been underrepresented at the senior levels of the political, governmental and professional domains — not because there aren't qualified women, but because the Israeli "old boys' network" remains powerful in a society in which the fault lines around the issue of women and their role are different from ours.

Historically in the Israeli society at war, women were the support for the men on the front lines. To this day, the military hierarchy is a source of candidates for senior civilian posts; and the military hierarchy is dominated by men. In addition, many of Israel's early immigrants came from patriarchal societies in which women did not participate in public life. The same is true of the ultra-Orthodox community, where the leadership is largely male. The early party machineries were run primarily by and for men, and only the recent democratization of internal party elections has opened the way for greater participation by women. In short, the Israeli "glass ceiling," impenetrable to women, has been much lower than in North America.

The debate, therefore, is less about the ends and more about the appropriate means for achieving them. There are those who agree with the intent of the law, but believe that a legislated outcome to a one-on-one competition for a given position is unfair and in its own way, discriminatory. Others argue that such measures are justified on a temporary basis to correct a systemic problem and that in any case, the women in question have to be qualified candidates for the positions offered.

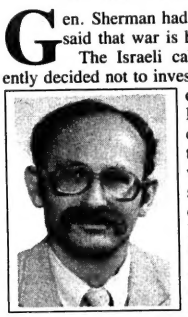
It isn't surprising that Israelis have turned to the law for resolution of these issues. Israel is a highly litigious society and the Supreme Court, acting as the High Court of Justice, can be petitioned by any citizen on just about any issue of law.

Social change is slow in Israel, and a sudden, unforeseen crisis can quickly erase the incremental progress required to change social norms and practices. Legislation is a "quick fix" that may be problematic but is also enforceable. It is not a comprehensive answer to a complex, evolving social phenomenon, but it may set new benchmarks for other areas of life and commerce in Israel. These amendments should be reexamined in future and amended again if no longer required. The preferred option is clearly voluntary action to reach the desired changes on behalf of women.

Appropriate to inquire

Gen. Sherman had it right when he said that war is hell.

The Israeli cabinet has apparently decided not to investigate allegations of murder of Egyptian PoWs committed during the 1956 and 1967 wars by Israeli soldiers and publicized in the Israeli and international media. Israel's 20-year statute of limitations seems to preclude prosecutions in any case. While sympathizing with the cabinet's reasoning, one can still argue that some form of inquiry, even without the possibility of prosecutions, should be held.



By Morton Weinfeld

The issue is an emotional one. Many Jews and supporters of Israel have idealized the IDF as different from "typical" armies. The doctrine of tohar ha'neshek, or purity of arms, reflected the influence of moral considerations on army behavior. The book Siah Lochamim, written after the 1967 war revealed the sensitive reflections of Israeli soldiers. The fact that Israel's was a citizen army also added to its reputation for civility and moderation.

At the same time, students of military history have long known that in war, even the "good guys" will violate the moral norms of warfare. The atrocities of the Axis powers in Europe and the Pacific during World War II are without parallel in human history. But the bombings of Dresden and Nagasaki, the murder and mistreatment of German PoWs by Soviet and other Allied forces after the war and the post-liberation murders of Nazi collaborators by vigilantes and various underground forces are examples of similar violations, though on a far smaller scale.

My late father, alav hashalom, a Holocaust survivor, told me of stories of partisan groups fighting behind German lines in occupied Poland in advance of the Red Army. On occasion, they would capture German soldiers and after interrogation would murder them. As fast moving guerrilla bands, they could neither take the chance of releasing them back to their units nor take them along as they sought to evade their German pursuers. This was the same rationale offered by Israel's Gen. Biron, who admitted to the murder of Egyptian PoWs in 1956.

What is surprising is not that individual Israeli soldiers have committed criminal acts. It is that such acts have been relatively rare, given the searing pressures of Israel's nearly 50-year struggle for survival. The killing of a Somali by Canadian forces on a peacekeeping mission, in conditions of far less threat or tension than those faced by Israelis in war or on duty in the territories, makes the Israeli record all the more impressive. The official Canadian inquiry is continuing.

What attests to the moral standing of an army or government is how they react after a violation comes to light. Several years ago, I systematically compared Israel's response to the Sabra and Shatilla massacres with that of the American government to the massacre of My Lai. We should note that the former atrocity was carried out by Lebanese Christian units, with, at worst, possible negligence by the nearby Israeli forces. The My Lai massacre was carried out directly by American forces in Vietnam. I felt that the thorough investigation in Israel compared very favorably with that undertaken by the Americans and enhanced Israel's moral stature.

What makes this issue difficult is that it arises as Israel finds itself literally at war with Hamas and Hamas supporters. The recent terrorist bombings of Israeli buses, with so many dead and wounded, focuses Israelis on the dangers associated with the peace process, not on possible misdeeds of some three and four decades past.

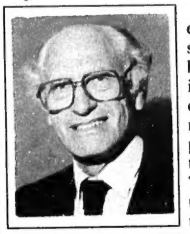
Israel has a duty to protect its citizens against terrorist savagery. The terrorist groups opposing Israel do not act according to the Geneva Convention and fighting them is no task for the faint of heart. Recently, the Israeli government has permitted the use of specific forms of pressure — what some might call torture — in the interrogation of terrorist suspects. There is little choice, though one hopes that the application of this policy is appropriately monitored.

The Israeli cabinet is understandably reluctant to open an old can of worms, while citizens mourn the loss of innocent victims of Arab terror. But perhaps when passions have cooled, there may be value in holding some form of inquiry into the allegations which have emerged concerning Egyptian PoWs. The objective need not be prosecutions or laying of blame. It is important to set the record straight based on the best evidence, and study the cases to see what might be learned from them for the future.

Of course there is a risk that such an investigation would provide ammunition for Israel's enemies. But those enemies will not become Israel's friends if no inquiry is held. Some type of inquiry would represent the proper response befitting Israel's moral heritage and the fact that so many of us hold the Israeli army in much deserved high esteem.

Monumental politics

Some weeks ago I noted in a column that while Holocaust museums have multiplied in the world, not a single major memorial exists in Germany.



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The reason is easy to understand: Germans have had no driving desire to be constantly reminded of what a previous generation had done. They did not deny that the Shoah took place — on the contrary, they are the only country in which such denial is a crime. That is why Ernst Zundel and company can't operate in their homeland, but go elsewhere to peddle their wares.

I was unaware at the time that plans were going ahead for a major memorial in Berlin and that a design competition was underway. Since then, on June 28, an agreement was reached by the city of Berlin, the federal administration and an organization of supporters of a memorial project, on which of the two final designs under consideration should be realized. In mid-March the jury responsible for selecting the design had narrowed the field from 528 competitors to two, and all the designs had been on public view. The proposal chosen by a committee of Berlin artists was created by another group of artists from Berlin led by the painter Christine Jacob-Marks. It consists of a monumental four-sided cement slab which measures no fewer than 109 yards in length, with a height of about 36 feet at its peak. All the known names of the millions of Jewish victims of Nazism will be engraved upon it.

The cost of the creation of the memorial will be some $25 million (US), plus the worth of the real estate, which was contributed by the federal government, estimated to have a value of about $40 million. But no sooner was the project approved and publicized than renewed controversy began.

To begin with, there were those who asserted that incising millions of names on the slab was a project without end.

Even those who had strongly supported the creation of a memorial were not sure that the extraordinary monumental dimensions were artistically attractive

There was also an objection from groups of Sinte and Roma (commonly known as Gypsies), who felt that they were excluded from an exclusively Jewish memorial. Others said that the slaughtering of homosexuals also needed to be recalled.

Last but not least, one also hears opponents who say that the whole thing has not been thought through.

The renewed discussion of the project may lead to its never being realized altogether. Even the Berlin Jewish community was divided on the matter.

All this has moved the whole matter into the area of politics. Many Germans no longer want to know about the Nazis and want to get on with their own lives. Others favor the monument and feel that somehow it will end once and for all the discussion of the Holocaust.

I have no idea where all of this will go. One thing is clear: whenever we touch the Shoah, it reveals itself as something that can be neither fully nor visibly expressed. So it is not surprising that when the Germans themselves tackle this darkest chapter of their history, ordinary procedures may fail them. This is not just another artists' competition for some building project; it is an attempt to recapture the indescribable.

Personally, the idea of inscribing all the names on the slab appeals to me. It is one way of telling them they are not forgotten.

The Kirshner File

Specter's presidential chances are slim

A Jewish president in America?

The prospects seem slim, despite a Gallup poll suggesting that 89 per cent of the electorate would vote for one.

By Sheldon Kirshner

The figure was 62 per cent when the American Jewish Committee conducted a similar survey in 1958. American voters thus seem more tolerant and open-minded than in the past. Nevertheless, Arlen Specter's chances of winning the presidency, let alone the Republican party's presidential nomination in 1996, are practically non-existent.

Specter — the first Jew to make a serious attempt to win that glittering prize — exudes confidence that he can prevail. "I think America is ready for a Jewish president," he told the Washington Jewish Week recently. "If it isn't, it should be."

In theory, Specter, who has been in the U.S. Senate since 1980, is right. The status of Jews in American society is far better today than before World War II, when overt manifestations of anti-Semitism were all too common in employment, housing, clubs and universities.

Be that as it may, Specter, 65, faces an uphill struggle as he battles for hearts and minds in a nation still riven by race and ethnicity. He is the dark horse candidate par excellence.

First, Specter lags far behind the main contenders — heavyweights like Bob Dole, Phil Gramm, Pete Wilson and Lamar Alexander — in terms of popularity and fund-raising.

Second, Specter's religion remains a factor. Even his chief strategist, a Washington lobbyist named Roger Stone, concedes that "there are a number of people who question whether a Jew can be president." In fact, Specter has received hate letters and two physical threats.

Third, geography is against him. Historically, the only Pennsylvanian who made it to the White House was James Buchanan (1857-1861).

Fourth, Specter is a moderate in a party which has grown increasingly conservative, if not reactionary, under the influence of the Christian Coalition and Newt Gingrich, the speaker of the House of Representatives. Specter, for example, is pro-choice on abortion, a position which is anathema to most Republicans.

Fifth, although he is widely respected for his intellect, he has an abrasive personality, a distinct disadvantage in a telegenic era.

These drawbacks, however, have not deterred Specter, who has tasted defeat more than once. He was defeated in four consecutive elections before he was finally elected to the Senate. He also lost a primary for mayor of Philadelphia and an election for governor.

Specter, the son of an immigrant from Ukraine, is running because he is convinced he can provide the kind of leadership and ideas the United States sorely needs as it enters a new millenium.

But it is highly doubtful whether the power brokers in the Republican party, or the voters in the country, will jump on his bandwagon.

Specter's candidacy, therefore, is nothing more than a footnote in history.

Srebrnik's book recalls Communist victory

In 1945, just months after the Allied victory in Europe, Phil Piratin, a Communist stalwart, won a seat in the British parliament. He represented the Mile End division of Stepney, an East London riding inhabited mainly by working-class Jews of East European origin.

One of two Communists who swept into the House of Commons that year, Piratin's victory was not entirely surprising. Indeed, it was the culmination of a concerted campaign to win the hearts and minds of Mile End's electorate.

Piratin's triumph was probably the highwater mark of the Communist party's success at the polls in Britain. Within five years, its appeal had withered, ending Piratin's fledgling career as an MP.

The ascendancy of his party is the subject of Henry Srebrnik's fine new book, London Jews and British Communism 1935-1945 (Vallentine-Mitchell, $39.50). Thoroughly researched and expertly told, this slim but substantive volume sheds light on the nature of Jewish life in Stepney, the social base of the Jewish Communist movement and the politics of Britain.

In an era when Communism is sharply on the decline, Srebrnik's book is an intriguing case study of the allure Marxism once exerted on a segment of London's populace. Yet the book is not without its flaws. Srebrnik omits all personal information about Piratin, who, unfortunately, remains a cipher.

Stepney was fertile ground for the Communists. By the beginning of the 1930s, he writes, it contained the largest number of foreign-born residents of any borough in Britain. Its Yiddish-speaking East European component formed a distinct, visible and autonomous community. Imbued with the ideas of socialism and Zionism, these Jews were politically and socially isolated and essentially at odds with their Anglo-Jewish and Christian neighbors in Stepney.

Marxism attracted the newcomers largely because the Communist party was unequivocably opposed to anti-Semitism, the fascist hordes of Sir Oswald Mosley, unemployment, overcrowded housing, inadequate health care facilities, and the wretched conditions which generally characterized life in Stepney.

Long before the 1945 general election was called, Piratin harped on these and other themes, observes Srebrnik, a former Montrealer and now a professor of political studies at the University of Prince Edward Island in Charlottetown.

Piratin hit his stride during the war. He demanded the immediate opening of a second front in Europe to ease the pressure on the Soviet Union. He spoke of the need for war crimes trials for Nazi leaders after the cessation of hostilities. He denigrated charges of black marketeering levelled against the Jewish community. He protested the roundup of Jewish aliens. Furthermore, Piratin exhibited sympathy for Jewish political aspirations in Palestine.

Piratin captured the Mile End seat with 5,075 votes (47.6 per cent). The Labor party and the Conservatives trailed, with 3,861 and 1,722, respectively. Interestingly enough, all other East London constituencies with large Jewish populations returned Labor MPs. (Shortly afterward, the Communist party took 10 seats in the Stepney borough election.)

In 1950, Piratin's seat was merged with two adjacent ridings, and as a result, he lost the general election. Some of his supporters cried foul, attributing his defeat to outright jerrymandering.

But the causes of his fall transcended dirty politics, Srebrnik suggests. In the post-war period, there was less interest in class politics and more in Zionism. The Cold War had begun and the ideological conflict between Communism and Zionism was in full swing. Besides, increasing number of Jews achieved their goal of upward mobility and moved out of Stepney, to be replaced by non-Jews indifferent or hostile to its Communist traditions.

Piratin, and the Communist party in Britain, were supplanted by the forces of history.

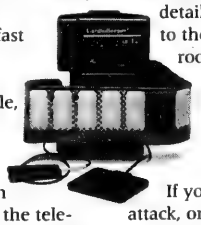
It's a known fact that 50% of heart attack victims die within the first two hours, usually because there has been a delay in seeking and getting appropriate treatment. Now there's a product and a service that can increase your odds of surviving a heart attack, through accurate diagnosis and fast emergency response.

It starts with the CardioBeeper®, a portable, state-of-the-art 12-lead Electrocardiogram unit (the same technology used in hospitals) which transmits your ECG via the telephone to an emergency monitoring centre, any time of the day or night. There, trained specialists quickly assess your ECG and other relevant information from your file and assist in the deployment of an ambulance if it is required. In the meantime, your medical records, normal baseline and current ECG readings plus other pertinent details are transmitted by fax to the hospital emergency room. Personalized treatment can then be prepared and administered – the instant you arrive.



Don't be another heart attack statistic.

If you've already had a heart attack, or are known to be at risk of one, this system could save your life.

Mazon offers holiday card

TORONTO — Mazon Canada will be marketing a full color Rosh Hashanah card this year as part of its efforts to raise money to alleviate the problem of hunger.

Toronto artist and calligrapher Baruch Dov donated the original artwork, based on a glass sculpture by Eric Wesselow. Inside the card is an adaptation from a poem by Charles Reznikoff, wishing Israel and their children a good year.

All donations from sale of the card will go to grassroots organizations like food banks that help feed the hungry in Canada.

The cards, sold eight for $12, are available by calling Mazon at 416-783-7554 or by writing to Mazon Canada at 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 206, Toronto, Ont. M6B 3K1.

Mizrachi bayit looking for new members

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A new, expanded version of the popular Bnei Akiva bayit, a minyan in the Bathurst-Wilson area, is looking for members.

The Mizrachi bayit, as it is being called, will provide, according to a media release, a "centrist Orthodox option" for young families, singles and others who want "a traditional but informal and vibrant atmosphere, where members participate and contribute. The intention is to provide a "friendly, young, affordable minyan."

President Sholom Eisenstat, head of an information technology program in the North York Board of Education, said that members of the congregation are responsible for all shul activities, including leading the davening, giving divrei Torah and holding classes.

Up to now, the minyan has held services in a room in the back of a building at 296 Wilson, which is owned by the Mizrachi Organization. They will now have much more room, as well as a direct entrance off Wilson.

They are planning to hold High Holy Day services this year, which are open to the public.

They are also in the process of planning programs which will include a Simchat Torah celebration.

Jack Kahn, president of Toronto Mizrachi, said, "This group will add to the strong and committed religious Zionist community in this location.

SEFER TORAH PRESENTED

Sen. Jerry Grafstein holds a special sefer Torah he presented recently to the Beth Tzedec Congregation. The Torah was likely written by Grafstein's great-grandfather, Samson Grafstein, circa 1860 in Poland. It came to Canada in 1927 and several years ago, Grafstein set about restoring it with the help of a sofer. Thought to be one of the oldest Torahs in Toronto still in use, it will be available at Beth Tzedec to any member of the Grafstein family for use at family events. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

Dear Friends:

Our community is among the world's most generous, thanks to UJA contributors who are with us year in and year out. You enable us to support exceptional services here and in Israel. But to meet growing needs, we need to expand our fundraising. We can't burden our best contributors with all the pressure of growth. We must broaden our base of supporters.

Consider this:

Over 20,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area live below the poverty line. More than 3,500 of them are children.

The Jewish population north of Steeles now exceeds 40,000. One third of them are under the age of 14. It's a community we've barely begun to service.

This year, more than 70,000 Jews will flee war-ravaged regions such as Bosnia or unstable countries like Ukraine and the Moslem republics. More people will immigrate to Israel from the Former Soviet Union than during the first year of Operation Exodus.

The old method of fundraising year by year will not meet new needs. We have to plan further ahead. Three years ahead.

That's why we're asking you to make your pledge for this year and for the following two years. By doing so, you'll give us more time for reach out to new donors. Your payment is due only in the year for which a pledge is made. Once you have subscribed to The Three Year Vision we will not seek another UJA gift from you until the 1999 Campaign.

The response so far has been overwhelmingly positive. We have already raised $25 million for the next three years.

When your canvasser calls, please do your part to help us confidently confront the challenges ahead. With your commitment to The Three Year Vision, we will accomplish more than ever before.

FOR OUR COMMUNITY. FOR ISRAEL.

THE THREE YEAR VISION

Your commitment to community.... Our commitment to you.

Your Three Year Pledge is good for the community.
When you pledge now for each of the 1996, 1997 and 1998 Campaigns:

- You'll help free up time to raise more money from others who aren't currently contributing to the Campaign
- You'll strengthen our community's ability to plan today for tomorrow's challenges
- We'll maintain our vital role in helping Jews from the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe to start a new life in Israel
- We'll begin the 1997 and 1998 Campaigns with millions of dollars already pledged instead of starting from zero

Your Three Year Pledge is good for you:

- We won't be back to ask you for a yearly gift until the 1999 Campaign
- We'll welcome you to UJA events and missions without any requests for additional giving
- You can better plan your charitable contributions over the long term

Continuity programmer named

TORONTO — One of Canada's most experienced outreach specialists has been appointed director of continuity programming for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Susan Jackson, director of community services and youth activities for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region assumes her new position next month.

Jackson will be the key professional working with the Federation's action committee for Jewish continuity, chaired by Les Klein.

Her responsibilities will include developing and administering new continuity initiatives in conjunction with organizations and individuals who have been asked to submit proposals.

The way Jackson sees it, her new job is more than mere administration.

"There's obviously a role in finding those who are disassociated from Jewish life," she says, "but we also have to find ways of preventing those who are in the system from dropping out."

Susan Jackson

She said she intends to act as a resource for continuity and to "animate and motivate" individuals to work in the Jewish community.

Jackson, a native Montrealer, is no stranger to the art of motivation. She regularly travels on behalf of Congress to far-flung Ontario towns and cities, where she offers small Jewish populations a Jewish experience.

She recently visited Sudbury to help with a wedding and not only made the kitchen kosher, but ended up as the bridal consultant as well.

"When you go to these places, there's instant gratification. They soak up everything they get. They're yearning for [Jewish input]," she said.

Focusing on the concerns of 25,000 Jews who live outside the Greater Toronto Area, Jackson has set up several small-city Jewish community services.

"It won't take our community long to be caught up in Susan's dynamism and deep commitment," commented Morris Zbar, Federation's director of community planning and allocations. "We're very fortunate she's on board."

וזה מביא אותי לליבה של הבעיה: מדינה דמוקרטית מנסה להגן על תושביה נגד טרוריסטים. הכל התחיל כזכור בקו 300 המפורסם. עיתונאים צילמו מספר מחבלים מורדים מן האוטובוס עם כניעתם, וכעבור כימה פורסם שהם נהרגו. צירוף של פרטים אלה הביא לפיתרון הבלתי נמנע שהם מתו במהלך חקירת שירות הביטחון הכללי (שב"כ). עד אז איש לא שאל איך מצליח השב"כ למצוא ולזהות טרוריסטים. מאותו רגע - נעשה ורעשה הארץ והביאו דוגמאות רבות של ערבים שעברו עינויים במרתפי השב"כ. כתוצאה מתהליך זה הוגבלו פעולותיהם של שירותי הביטחון, ולטענת תוקרי השב"כ - קטנה יכולתם לזהות טרוריסטים. בעקבות הפיגוע האחרון בירושלים התיר ראש הממשלה לשב"כ לנקוט ב"כל האמצעים הדרושים" וראה זה פלא: תוך יממה זוהה מתכנן הפיגועים האחרונים וזוהו מספר פיגועים בשלבי תיכנון. קרוב לודאי שבכך ניצלו חייהם של ישראלים רבים. כדי לחדד את הבעיה כדאי לזכור שהמתכנן של הפיגועים האחרונים היה בידי השב"כ כבר מספר פעמים כחשוד, אולם בגלל שלא יכלו להפעיל עליו לחץ מירבי - הוא לא גילה כלום. וזה מחזיר אותי ללב הדילמה: אין ספק שחופש הפעולה של השב"כ יזהה יותר פצצות מתקתקות וימנע פיגועים. אין גם ספק שהדבר יגרום עינויים קשים להרבה ערבים חפים מפשע. שישאר בינינו: המשוואה הסופית הפשוטה והאכזרית היא: יותר עינויים ליותר ערבים חפים מפשע יביאו לפחות רצח של יהודים חפים מפשע. מאחר והפלשתינאים אינם מסוגלים בשלב זה להפסיק את הטירור של החמאס בעצמם, חייבים הישראלים לעשות כל שביכולתם לעשות זאת. פירושו של דבר הוא שכדי להגן על עצמה, חייבת ישראל הדמוקרטית לנקוט בצעדי חירום בלתי דמוקרטיים. המחיר יהיה קשה - אבל איש בעולם אינו יכול להאשים את ישראל שהיא בחרה מרצונה בדרך זו. אי אפשר לדרוש ממדינה דמוקרטית לנקוט באמצעים תרבותיים ודמוקרטיים כדי למנוע מהכוחות האפלים ביותר שידעה היסטוריה האנושית מלפגוע בה. זו לפחות דעתי.

Genealogical quest could aid medical researchers

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Stanley Diamond is trying to solve a mystery that would tax the most experienced sleuth.

The semi-retired Montreal businessman is searching for an ancestor — an unknown number of generations back — whom Diamond shares with a woman in Israel.

This is no ordinary quest for one's roots. If Diamond can trace his family tree and that of the woman — Rita Itkin Paran of Jerusalem — back far enough, he will make a valuable contribution to medicine's knowledge of thalassemia, a genetically-passed blood disorder most prevalent among people of Mediterranean, African and Southeast Asian ancestry.

Although occasionally found among Sephardim, the disease is almost unheard of in Ashkenazim. So Diamond was astonished to accidentally discover that he — whose family comes from Poland — is a carrier of thalassemia.

Diamond will spend two weeks next month in Poland to pore over archives and records in his quest to find more branches of his family tree.

Mass blood screenings

Recent independent studies by Dr. Charles Scriver of the Montreal Children's Hospital and Dr. Ariella Oppenheim of Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem coincidentally discovered, through DNA testing, that he and Paran share a previously unknown mutation of this trait. Only six Ashkenazi families in Israel are known to be thalassemia carriers, and they were discovered through mass blood screenings.

The disease, which causes severe anemia (a deficiency of iron in the blood), usually claims its victims before their 30th birthday. One must inherit the gene from both parents to have thalassemia.

Carriers do not have the disease but often have mild chronic anemia.

So far, Diamond has traced the gene to his late father Harry and to his maternal grandmother Masha Widelec who died at 103 in 1963. Finding out which of her parents — Jankiel Widelec born in Ostrow Mazowiecka, Poland in 1826 or Sora Nowes, also born around the same time in Poland — was the carrier is the next step.

Harry was tested before he died in 1987; Masha was pinpointed because Diamond found that the descendants of her siblings are carriers. Each generation back, the number of relatives doubles approximately, so the investigation becomes that much more difficult.

One thing is certain: the gene continues to be inherited by some members of succeeding generations. The youngest is the 4-year-old grandson of Diamond's sister.

Doctors say Diamond, 61, and Paran, 37, are almost certainly genetic cousins because they share a unique form of the gene and are Ashkenazim. She is from Bobruysk (now in Belarus) and immigrated to Israel a few years ago.

So far, Diamond has only been able to trace carriers back to Paran's still-living paternal grandmother who was born in Belarus in 1916. Now, the key is to find out whether it was Paran's mother, Fraydel Manchik, or father, Yankel Alterman, who was the carrier.

Although from different countries, Diamond notes that his and Paran's antecedents lived only about 300 km from each other.

Diamond has been able to get to this point by putting to work his hobby of genealogy, which has undergone a revolution in recent years with the development of computer software and the Internet.

It's because thalassemia is so rare among Ashkenazim that Diamond has set out on his mission to warn other Jews that it is possible for them to be carriers.

And because of its obscurity, very few will ever be tested. But with intermarriage with non-Jews and between Ashkenazim and Sephardim rising, Diamond warns that they may pass a "ticking time-bomb" to their descendants.

There's a one in four chance that children of two carriers will inherit fatal thalassemia.

Diamond, president of the new Montreal Jewish Genealogical Society, is reaching out to other Jewish genealogy buffs through the Internet to find other Ashkenazi thalassemia carriers.

Should he find another Ashkenazi Jew with his mutation, that person will almost certainly be somehow related to him and Paran.

Diamond recently learned of an Ashkenazi family in Toronto whose members are carriers. Medical ethics prevent their doctor from providing Diamond with their name, but the doctor has informed the family and now, Diamond is anxious to hear from them.

For Scriver and Oppenheim, who are now collaborating in their research, finding the earliest carriers will enable them to "triangulate" the source of the genetic trait, and thus gain a better understanding of its transmission.

Diamond is continuing his research not only in Polish and newly accessible Belarussian archives, but also at the Mormon Church's world-renowed genealogy centre in Salt Lake City.

Student volunteers to aid Belarus Jews

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — When Joshuah Spinner arrived in Jerusalem last year to study at Yeshiva Midrash Shmuel, he says he felt immensely guilty, almost embarrassed, to see most young people engaged in some kind of national service.

Young North American Jews, by comparison "don't do anything," he says. The idea of doing some kind of public service became visceral for him.

Now the 24-year-old Baltimore-born Hamilton-raised student has left for Belarus as Yeshiva University Students for the Spiritual Revival of Post-war Jewry's (YUSSR) first paid field worker, on a pilot project to create a national service program.

The organization's purpose is to establish Jewish youth groups and programs for 12- to 17-year-olds in Belarus, Ukraine and St. Petersburg and eventually, to have a field worker in each area.

Last year, Spinner spent three weeks in the former Soviet Union, working as a volunteer at the winter camp near Vitebsk and the summer camps in the Crimea, followed by a week's "sort of see-if-you-can-handle-it-alone trip" to St. Petersburg and Minsk, he told The CJN before he left.

New York-based YUSSR was formed five years ago by students and was entirely student-run until this year, when Rabbi Binyamin Krauss was appointed executive director.

The organization is funded by contributors to the Soviet Jewry cause and fundraising carried out by the students.

Spinner will be based in Minsk, which has by far the largest Jewish community in Belarus. The country has about 60,000 Jews in total.

He hopes to make contact with Jews in all the smaller cities and wherever possible, establish youth groups, with the eventual goal of forming a national youth movement.

Taking 20 to 30 kids with leadership potential on a six-week tour of Israel has proved enormously successful, he said, as was last year's training of 17- to 18-year-olds in several cities to run youth groups.

The purpose is to give youngsters throughout the region some basic religious instruction and teach them about Judaism, Jewish history and Israel.

Above all, Spinner's aim is to instil a sense of belonging to and feeling of responsibility towards the Jewish community.

Students love Guelph's 'homey' atmosphere

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Julia Rowan thinks it would be sad if a Jewish student decided not to attend the University of Guelph on the basis of its small Jewish student population.

Rowan is incoming co-president of its Jewish Students' Organization (JSO). She loves the school's homey feeling and its proximity to her family in Toronto.

"It's a very friendly university," says her co-president Sara Fisher, a native of Thornhill who, like Rowan, is a second-year Sociology student.

Anti-Semitism is not a problem on campus, the two 20-year-old students said in a recent interview, but there is a lot of ignorance about Judaism among non-Jewish students and even faculty.

"The majority of people I became friends with from small towns had never met a Jewish person," said Rowan.

Although some university exams have been scheduled for Saturdays, "if you tell them you're Jewish, they'll reschedule," said Fisher.

The JSO shares office space with the campus Catholic organization, and "we get along great," said Fisher. Professor Michael Sobol serves as JSO staff adviser.

Upcoming JSO events include monthly social programs as well as lectures open to the entire university population. Their big event for this year will be a Holocaust education program.

Last year about 75 students, of the estimated 200 Jewish students attending the university, signed up with the JSO. About 20 to 30 people, on average, showed up for their weekly kosher bagel, lox and cream cheese brunches held in a campus meeting room.

Fisher and Rowan hope to increase active membership in the JSO, and are looking for students to join the executive or help with programming. Even non-members will have access to JSO information through the Internet.

Students are welcome to attend Beth Isaiah Synagogue, which is within walking distance of the university. For Jewish holidays, the JSO has participated in inter-university parties with Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo and other nearby campuses.

It was at one such event that Rowan met her boyfriend, a student at the University of Waterloo.

"I thought I'd be dateless for four years," said Rowan, whose decision not to interdate was influenced by her grandparents' experience as Holocaust survivors.

Going to a larger university doesn't guarantee involvement with other Jewish students, noted Fisher. "We have a very friendly group."

Interested Guelph students can find out more about the JSO on Club Days (Sept. 18 and 19), when the group will have a display in the University Centre.

Jewish education opens door to an ancient inheritance

By NESSA RAPOPORT
Special to The CJN

What constitutes Jewish aristocracy? I have had occasion to meditate on this question as I consider my switch in career — from the glamor of publishing to the strangely glamorous world I now inhabit, that of Jewish education.

GUEST VOICES

For a decade I was a senior editor at a New York trade publishing house, where I specialized in autobiography. I have read thousands of memoirs, many by members of the upper classes — who, for understandable reasons, found it easier to get their words into print. One feature of some English and American aristocrats is the expectation that they and their progeny were put on earth not merely to expand their holdings but also to contribute to the common good.

I have also read — and edited — many memoirs by people who changed the world because of their own gifts, vision and stamina; that is, through yichus atzmi, aristocracy of the self.

When I tell people I once edited the best-selling book of the 1980s and now I spend my days attempting to revitalize Jewish education in North America, they usually ask me if I miss my old life.

But when I go on to say that day after day I am encountering the most perplexing and fascinating challenges about the shaping of the Jewish soul in contemporary America, and when I explain that transforming Jewish schools into communities of teaching and learning turns out to be a trope for how we live as Jews and what we believe is possible for ourselves, glazed eyes and apathetic expressions turn to curiosity — and occasionally, to hope.

Can teachers change? (Can people change?) Can education change lives? (Are we afraid it might?) What kind of Jews do we want to emerge from our schools, from our communities? (Will a fragile unspoken consensus break apart if we try to answer that question?) In speaking about — yes — Jewish education, I can still provoke a riveting conversation at a dinner party.

For here is the paradox. American Jews are among the most highly educated citizens of this country. For decades we have pushed ourselves and our children to attend the most prestigious schools and colleges, to flock to law and medical schools, making Jews and education virtually synonymous.

Why, then, do we not bring the same expectations to Jewish education as we do to general education? Why do we not demand that the settings in which Jewish education takes place be as rigorous and stimulating as private elementary schools or Ivy League colleges? Why are the professions, the humanities or an MBA seen as legitimate, demanding or practical, whereas a career in Jewish education is deemed parochial? What must change before many more American Jews are able to declare with pride: "My child is a Jewish educator"?

Judaism resilient enough to tackle the toughest questions

A Jewish education is not about how many hours a week a child spends in a Jewish school. It is not about preparation for bar or bat mitzvah or the ability to read Hebrew. And it is not about knowing who said what to whom in the Torah. It is not confined to the synagogue on Saturday nor to the ages between 8 and 13 or 5 and 17. It is not defined by visiting Israel or studying in Israel — powerful as those experiences may be.

In fact, it is not separate from how we earn a living, how we treat our friends or what we do about Bosnia. Rather, it should be an invitation — to any Jew — to feel entitled to his or her inheritance, an invitation to engage with a tradition unafraid of asking the great questions: Why is there suffering in the world? What can we know about love? Where can we find comfort when friends' words hurt? When someone beloved dies? How can we heal?

A Jewish education should have something to say about the anxiety of being middle-aged in a youth-worshipping culture; about being a parent who wants to impart an old and complicated tradition in a non-philosophical, quick-fix era; about being a child in a country that often marks success by quantity of possessions, a country that is among the least supportive of children and their families in the industrialized world.

Education is about nothing less than living itself. An ongoing Jewish education must address the question: What does it mean to be a Jew in America today? How do we look honestly at the tension between our subscribing to the American values of individual achievement and the right to privacy, along with the mobility and secularity that follow, while still sharing a culture of belief and peoplehood, providing a safety net in times of trouble, and having access to a vocabulary and community with which to mark the most significant moments of life?

Judaism is resilient enough to take on this question — and other tough questions, too. It is strong enough to be held accountable, particularly to the perceptive questions of children. But it is up to us to raise the transmission and interpretation of our tradition to the exalted standards it deserves.

What have I come to understand after a year of immersing myself in issues of Jewish education? Like those aristocrats in the memoirs I love to read, I find myself rich, not because I sought the passion and majesty of my tradition, but because it was bequeathed to me by my grandparents and parents. And being — I hope — well brought-up, I would like to give something back.

Nessa Rapoport, author of A Woman's Book of Grieving, *is a graduate of Associated Hebrew School in Toronto. She now works for the Council for Initiatives in Jewish Education in New York, whose mission is to revitalize North American Jewish education by building the profession of Jewish education and mobilizing community support for Jewish education. Dry Bones

Jewish Life

Stones

by Hindy Nosek-Abelson conceived in Jerusalem - finished in Toronto July, '95

Through an open window in my Jerusalem home
A naked slope with pitted stones like weathered skin on fragile bones glares with hope and silent sighs through rocky skulls with hollow eyes

They speak these stones, they scold, they yell
The greatest story told they tell
Of soldiers killed in battles old of sons and daughters who just fell
Of Philistines and Babylon
Palestine and Lebanon

Roman Caesars, Roman Popes
Scattered exiles, shattered hopes
Your single messiah - Our millions to be all crucified with pagan glee as Rome stood chuckling silently
Each rock, each stone - a skull - a bone

.....Finally they've all come home

As hot dry winds blow dusty sand the arid slope's old shriveled hand reaches out, caresses me
Some green appears - a shrub - a tree
Melons, peaches , honey, wine
It beckons me with songs sublime

.....and welcomes home each bone of mine

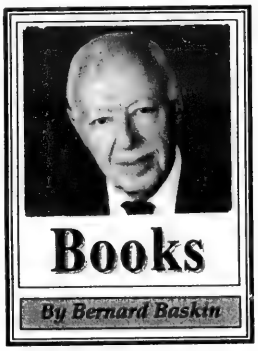
A Diving Rock On The Hudson
by Henry Roth McClelland & Steward Inc. $33.50



At 88, confined to an electric-wheelchair in New Mexico, in great physical pain and mental anguish, Henry Roth can look back on two "miracles."

The first involves his novel, Call It Sleep, published in 1938, which was little read and quickly faded from public memory. But, 30 years later, when it reappeared as a paperback, it was hailed as a long-neglected masterpiece. Extravagantly praised, it sold over one million copies and found a firm niche in modern American literature.

Call It Sleep, striking in style, reflecting the strong influence of James Joyce, depicted immigrant life in New York's Lower East Side at the beginning of the century, as experienced through the eyes and the emotions of an 8-year- old boy.

But after this unexpected triumph Roth was unable to write again for 60 years — apart from a few articles and stories. Then the second "miracle" occurred. The long, inexplicable writing drought ended when he announced the completion of a six-volume saga of autobiographical fiction running to 3,200 pages, the entire work to be called, Mercy of a Rude Stream.

The first of the volumes, published last year, received largely favorable reviews. It was a good start. But could Roth successfully sustain his enormous project? Now, with the second instalment, readers can stop holding their breath. Roth is creating a classic work of great interest and artistry.

A Diving Rock on the Hudson continues the story of Ira Stigman. As a teenager he finds employment as a bus conductor, stadium soda "hustler" and plumber's assistant. The author seems blessed with total recall as he skilfully limns Ira's world — his family and friends, his Harlem neighborhood and his varied experiences at high school and college. And, of course, the inner turmoil, alienation, sexual awakening and emotional and intellectual growth of a troubled young man.

A shocking aspect of the novel concerns Ira's repeated acts of incest with his younger sister. In a recent interview, Roth insisted that these episodes are fictional not, in any sense, to be regarded as autobiographical. But doubt persists. Some critics have suggested that this long-hidden relationship might be the cause of his suspended literary career.

As in the earlier work, the aged writer interrupts the narrative from time to time to hold absorbing conversations with his computer, "Ecclesias." They add a dimension of necessary evaluation to events of Ira's life, a kind of interplay of memory and present tense reflection.

Roth is a superlative writer. The many setpieces are superb and almost every page offers delights of description and imagery.

A typical example of Roth's ability to create a sense of place is the following. Ira walks "Through the crowded, noisy, fitful avenue, past indifferent landmarks, the Flatiron Building, past hectic intersections, Herald Square, Times Square, onward plodding: Columbus Circle, dully recognizing the changing character of the neighborhood, from commercial to apartment house, from utilitarian building to ornate, many-storied, multi-balconied edifice. At 96th Street, he quit Broadway, turned west toward the Hudson, entered on the lofty viaduct above the riverbank. On the paved paths down below — mothers, nursemaids, tending prams, the infants in them so snugly, colorfully bundled against the variable, brisk river wind ... How enjoyable was every sight and sound, if every sight and sound didn't drag a lead weight after it. Look at the water of the broad Hudson, choppy, whitecaps nicked out of the cold, grey river by the wind."

The writer who achieved what some have called "the literary comeback of the century" has given us two exciting books. It is good to know that there is much more to come.

Sometimes the Most Dignified Things are the Simplest.

Everyone has their own idea of what simple means. To us at The Simple Alternative it means good taste and common sense. Simplicity and dignity are the two hallmarks of Jewish funeral traditions. Expensive caskets and elaborate services are simply not part of this tradition. And, as many of our families tell us: sometimes the most dignified things in life are the simplest.

For complete details, ask for our Jewish information folder, or call our Jewish Funeral Consultant, Harvey Poch at (416) 441-1580.

Services, including transfer and shelter of the deceased, shemirah, tahara, linen shrouds, simple all-wood coffin, funeral coach, chapel or synagogue service — $1,950. Higher and lower cost options also available.

Food

Corn syrup – an effective replacement for fat

Using corn syrup instead of fat in cakes, cookies and muffins is a trend that's here to stay.

Best Foods has developed fat free baking recipes for the public that have the flavor and texture of their full fat counterparts.

"Technically, it's extremely difficult to remove all the fat from a recipe because many ingredients such as flour contain trace amounts," explains Sandra Albrecht, director of consumer services. "However, our fat free recipes are unique in that they contain no added fat such as butter, margarine, oil or shortening. As a result, these recipes have less than one gram of fat per serving and no cholesterol.

Corn syrup is an effective fat replacement because its malto dextrin component contributes to the thickness and richness usually provided by fat in recipes. Specifically, the liquid texture of corn syrup adds moisture while the sugar tenderizes and helps prevent staleness.

Unfortunately, there is no magic formula for converting recipes because the higher moisture content and sweetness of corn syrup requires adjustments to other liquid and sweet ingredients. As well, high fat ingredients like nuts and egg yolks must be eliminated, cocoa substituted for chocolate and skim milk, juice or water for whole milk or sour cream.

These ideas are from the new Fat Free Baking recipe brochure, available free of charge, by writing to: More Recipes for Fat Free Baking, Box 500, Etobicoke Ont., M5C 4V5.

NO-BAKE FRUIT CRISP SQUARES

(Makes 25 squares)

½ cup lightly packed brown sugar
¼ cup corn syrup
2 cups crisp rice cereal, kosher
¾ cup chopped mixed dried fruits
½ cup rolled oats
Cooking spray

In small saucepan heat brown sugar and syrup on low, stirring to dissolve sugar. In large bowl combine remaining ingredients. Add syrup mixture. Mix well, until all ingredients are moistened. Press firmly in 8-inch square pan sprayed with cooking spray. Cool. Do not chill. Cut into squares.

CHOCOLATE OAT CRISPS

(Makes 2½ dozen cookies)

1 cup rolled oats
⅔ cup all-purpose flour
⅔ cup granulated sugar
⅓ cup cocoa, sifted
1 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt
2 egg whites
⅓ cup corn syrup
1 tsp vanilla
1 cup crisp rice cereal, kosher
Cooking spray

In large bowl combine oats, flour, sugar, cocoa, baking powder and salt. In small bowl whisk egg whites, corn syrup and vanilla together to blend well. Add liquid mixture to dry ingredients, stirring until all ingredients are moistened. Stir in cereal. Dough will be thick. Drop by rounded spoonfuls onto baking sheet sprayed with cooking spray. Bake in preheated 350F oven 9-11 minutes, or just until set. Cool 5 minutes on baking sheet, then remove to wire rack to cool.

PINEAPPLE CARROT MUFFINS

(Makes 12 muffins)

1¼ cups all purpose flour
¼ cup corn starch
1½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. ground ginger
2 egg whites
¾ cup lightly packed brown sugar
¼ cup syrup
1 cup undrained crushed pineapple
1 cup grated carrots
⅔ cup raisins
Cooking spray

In large bowl combine flour, corn starch, baking powder, cinnamon, baking soda, salt and ginger. In small bowl whisk egg whites, brown sugar and corn syrup together to blend well. Stir in pineapple. Add liquid mixture to dry ingredients, stirring until all ingredients are moistened. Stir in carrots and raisins; mix well. Spoon into muffin cups sprayed with cooking spray. Bake in preheated 375F oven 20-25 minutes, or until toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool 5 minutes in pan, then remove to wire rack to cool.

Extension packages are available through Aufgang Travel at 416-789-7117. It is important to make plans for extensions as early as possible to ensure space at hotels and on return flights.

INSURANCE — All participants must subscribe to an out of country medical insurance policy. Individuals who have their own coverage will have to present proof of policy. Aufgang Travel is offering a comprehensive group travel insurance package which will provide the following coverage: trip cancellation and interruption; emergency hospital/medical; flight accident; travel accident and baggage and personal effects.

PAYMENTS — A deposit of $250 payable to United Israel Appeal must accompany each application form to secure a space on the mission. A deposit of $450 is required if you are requesting a single supplement and/or business class, both of which will be limited. The balance of the price must be paid by December 31st, 1995. Payments for insurance and extension packages are payable directly to Aufgang Travel.

REFUNDS — The deposit is refundable until December 1, 1995. Until January 1, 1996 - 75% of payment is refundable. After February 1, 1996 - 50% of payment is refundable.

PORTARA:

Mondi launches new line

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Mondi, the Munich-based international fashion house, recently launched Portara, a new contemporary line of women's clothing, which made its retail debut in August.

Portara has taken off in the market place said Mondi's Ontario agent Henny Baker.

"I was overwhelmed by the response from buyers. I did triple [the business than] what I expected," Baker said.

Mondi is sold in 60 countries and produces three lines: Mondi, better sportswear; Patrizia, the plus-size label; and Portara, which targets women 21 to 35.

"Portara is item-driven," Baker said. "There's that one piece you have to buy to add to your wardrobe like the cropped mohair sweater or the reversible leather jacket."

Portara, sold in sizes 34 to 42, is priced 30 to 50 per cent less than Mondi, she said. For example, a Mondi jacket retails for $595 and a Portara one is $295. The average retail price is $150 for Portara pants and $125 for its skirts. The Portara collection is geared to fashion-conscious women who are just beginning careers, Baker said.

Mondi's new line, Portara, targets women ages 21-35.

Short hip skirts

Vests and skirts are more fitted and trimmed into the waist and skirt lengths are short, with most buyers opting for 45- rather than 52-centimetre lengths, she said. The collection offers five clothing groups named after five major cities: Rome, Berlin, New York, Tokyo and Singapore.

The Rome group, beige- and sand-colored clothing accented in electric blue and bronze, was the first of the Portara line to appear in stores. Short walking shorts are paired with a cropped jacket accented with a gold polyurethane vest.

Short hip skirts are accessorized with aprons fitting snugly over the hips like extra-short miniskirts. A loose fitting box-style blazer is matched with a miniskirt or tapered-leg pants.

The other sportswear/separates groups which are based on color combinations — the Berlin group is browns and steel blues, and the New York is predominantly black and greys — offer styles similar to the Rome group with some variations in each group.

The Berlin group offers a selection of leathers: a box-style reversible brown-coconut-leather jacket is one of the most striking items while the New York group shows a long black outer-wear wool-twill coat worn over a suit in the same fabric.

The Tokyo group in reds and blacks and the Singapore in silver and powder pink accented with black are geared for evening wear. Popular with buyers were the ankle-length black chiffon skirt teamed with a long sleeve black viscose poly-mesh sweater from the Tokyo group and the short empire-waisted silk dresses in silver, pink and black from the Singapore group, Baker said.

She pointed out another evening look from the Singapore group which she said sold very well: pastel mohair sweaters worn over short, flared, silk tap-skirts.

The Portara collection can be found at these stores: Exempler, 390 Spadina; Mendocino, 2674 Yonge St. and Yorkdale; XTC at 7355 Bayview Ave. (at John); and Mondi in Hazelton Lanes.

Fall Fashion

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

We think we can escape, but they are everywhere. We consult our favorite full-length mirror, scrupulously checking front, back and side views for unseemly panty lines, any discernible bumps, bulges and less than perfect contours. We check for good lift and separation, as we reconfirm our color enhancing and figure flattering choices of the day.

So much to think about, lest we get caught by ... the Fashion Police.

Who are the Fashion Police? They are a self-appointed body of the fashion conscious elite who cruise the streets in unmarked vehicles staking out their territory, looking for unwitting prey at whom they can point a finger and yell, "Fashion Faux Pas."

Intersections are a haven for the Fashion Police. They can peruse four corners at a single glance and issue summons by an icy stare. Three warnings from the Fashion Police and then you are on a "Fashion All-Points Bulletin."

I have been close. Venturing out on an early morning errand in my uglies, hands on the wheel, eyes straight ahead, I dare not look left or right. If I get caught, how will I face myself?

"But I'm one of you," I silently plead. "Give me another chance."

What can we do to avoid such humiliation? Never leave the house unless dressed to the nines? Become paranoid? Never answer the door without makeup? Wear a bra to bed? Sure, but only if you decide not to make reality part of your daily routine.

Now that the cooler weather is around the corner we have many options for fall dressing. The Fashion Police may be back from their vacation but we don't have to get caught. To be right up there with the best dressed this season keep an eye out for the color red, the seven-eighths coat, stripes, the feminine moulded suit, lurex, animal prints and faux furs. There will be a trend towards mixed not matched looks, and the ankle boot will remain a staple in footwear — in both military and Eurochic styling.

In the office, dressing appropriately always requires conscious effort and attention. This is one place we want to elude the Fashion Police at all cost; demerit points here could mean a permanent record.

To be successful in today's highly competitive marketplace, it is essential to maintain a professional image consistent with the product or service you are selling. Using discretion and our own common sense should help to eliminate any enbarrassing workplace fashion faux pas.

Women: Remember that short skirts are great, but you should be able to bend down or reach above your head and still keep everything you wish to be covered under wraps. You might want to consider the long skirted scenario.

Men: Unless it is a casual Friday, please wear long sleeves to the office. Short sleeve dress shirts (circa 1952) do not have that look of polished professionalism. If you are uncomfortable, it is very acceptable to take off your jacket and roll back your sleeves.

Everyone: Please remember that casual dress refers to the degree of formality not the degree of quality of the clothing you choose for the office.

Everything Old is Newt Again

by Joy Cherry

Like politics, dear reader, fashion has taken an abrupt turn to the right.

As the 60's come tippytoeing back on little white go go boots, let us pause in affectionate remembrance of Jackie O.

Stroll Fifth Avenue with me, and note all of the 20-somethings geometrically arrayed in tiny triangular headscarves and huge round shades. Push your way, as I did recently, into either of Milan's hot Prada stores, and watch, open-mouthed, as Miuccia Prada's 60's-influenced collection disappears off the shelves in the blink of an eye.

Think back on all those hip Seinfeld folk paying homage to the waif-like elegance of Audrey Hepburn breakfasting at Tiffany's in her nifty shifts and bell-skirted ballgowns. Then you'll understand why this fashion season could definitely be dubbed "Fall-y Go Lightly". Face it. Bust darts are back!

But wait. Take a second look at déjà vu before you rummage in the closet for your favourite back numbers. That "60" has been flipped over to lend nostalgia a new "90"s attitude, and clothes a fresh wearability.

The passing of Camelot's First Lady has merely inspired a renaissance of femininity, clean, spare, classic and sexy ... crafted in fluid new lightweight materials as soft as a breath.

'Tis the season of renewal, and as we approach Rosh Hashanah, we contemplate religious rebirth hot on the heels of the trek back from the cottage and getting the gang back to school. It's time again for the coming together of the family in celebration of the new year 5756.

A Talmudic reference advises us to approach the High Holidays in a mood of confidence and hope, which, in turn, is seen as a reason for the wearing of festive new garments.

Even our store has undergone a renaissance, its good bones given a dramatic facelift by sophisticated marbleized walls in glossy black frames ... the better to show off the "festive new garments" of fall.

Let me show you around.

We'll start with the suit, this season's new wow factor. What to have if you're having only one. And our suits are merely fabulous. We have Escada. We have Nina Ricci. We have Louis Féraud. We have Christian Dior ... in an affordable price range from $495.

I'm looking at this just-arrived Louis Féraud original. My favourite colour this fall? Animal print. Like Eve, we're snake charmed, full of dashing, dotty, diamond animal spirits. And Féraud has split this jacket whimsically down the middle, one half python, the other leopard. Who says you can't have it all? A standout, and like all our suits, in fabric so lightweight it has no season.

Come knit pick. Right now, the knit is IT. Woven today with microfibre thread, knits hold their shape. They're flexible. They breathe. They don't cling. So knit one. Purl two. Slip into this Chanel-influenced A-line chemise ... pink as a blush, with black satin collar anchored by one perfect rose. Or live in any of our updated classic knit suits. They're perfect to fling a coat over ... and this collection comes from Placenza, fabrications from the finest mill in Italy. They wear their pedigree on their sleeve ... and they're quietly gorgeous, light as a wisp yet toasty warm.

This month only, you get a bonus hand-made chenille boa (a $40 value) with any coat purchased ... face-flattering in your choice of a rainbow of colours.

Here's the belted wrap coat Sharon Stone made famous ... loden, camel, dark grey or greige. Or a Jil Sander-influenced caramel classic ... single-breasted with raglan sleeves, collar and lapel lovingly top-stitched by hand.

Shrug one on: feeling is believing. Top it with a crushable ruby velour hat from our millinery collection ... only $75. Or scoop up a classic airline hat with ear flaps and tie-up pom poms ... just $55 till they fly away.

The new glamour in ballgowns embraces our need from some upbeat energy. We have an incredible collection just now ... from full-skirted magnificence to the understated column. (One sold recently will dance at the White House ... as Hillary Clinton hosts a major ball for the Pediatric Fellows).

Our big news is Vera Wang — design star of this year's Oscar's — exclusively ours in Toronto.

Her famous gown is the subtle black see-through ... à la Holly Hunter's much talked about Oscar appearance ... this one with illusion sleeves and back playing peek-a-boo with the derrière.

Come in. See. Try. Chat. Catch up. A family wedding and other personal concerns clipped my travel wings this year, but New York and Milan were on my agenda. We had the pleasure of outfitting the delightful wife of the "Phantom", and I exchanged favourite New York restaurants with the oh-so-charming Robert Pilon. His? Ravelled Sleeve, 79th and 3rd. Mine? Fresco, on East 52nd. The buzz is so thick, what with movie stars and ad biggies everywhere, you can barely remember to chew!

Enjoy the fall-de-rol. And remember, fashion is like life. Be bold, not boring. Devour it all.

Shana Tovah Umetuka. A Happy and Sweet New Year!

Makeovers make us all pretty women

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The sound of Roy Orbison singing Pretty Woman set the evening's mood at a recent makeover extravaganza.

Anticipation hung in the air while the audience watched the models — two nervous-looking women on stage — waiting for their makeovers to begin.

As the evening unfolded Joanne Giannone, 27, and Rosemary Magill, 52, got new hairstyles, thanks to hairdresser Frances Stern. They had their makeup professionally applied, courtesy of makeup artist and teacher Francine Birken.

Rosemary ...before

Tall, dark-haired Giannone, an information management supervisor, was the model for the evening look. Stern smoothed out her long thick, curly tresses, which brought out Giannone's natural elegance. Dramatic evening makeup emphasized her best features, her large, dark eyes and her high cheekbones.

Giannone, who was enrolled in one of Birken's makeup classes at Richvale, said she loved the way her teacher had done her makeup — a minimum was applied and it was well-blended. "I go to work and feel like a plain Jane and at night I feel like an entirely different person," she said.

While taking Birken's course, she says she learned how to create a natural, clean look with makeup and she has since experimented with cosmetics in colors she had not tried before.

Rosemary...after

Magill, a receptionist, began the evening with a full head of layered hair. When Stern cut her blond hair, she left some length on the top as Magil doesn't like her hair too short, but she trimmed the bottom until it was fashionably short and wispy. Magill's subtle day makeup, which included a touch of pale pink lipstick, was perfect for the office.

Magill liked her new hairdo. She rarely changes her hairstyle and is "more apt to wear the same style" for a long time, she said. Another one of Birken's students, she says she learned the proper techniques for applying eye makeup and blusher at the classes.

Throughout the evening Birken gave her audience skin care and makeup tips. She stressed the importance of using cleanser, toner and moisturizer twice a day — in the morning and at night — and advised them never to wash their faces with soap since it dries the skin.

Joanne...before

As foundation won't cover discoloration under the eyes, it is best to use a concealer before applying foundation, Birken recommended. And foundation should be well blended, she emphasized. "There is nothing worse than seeing an orange line on the jaw."

To keep a steady hand while applying eyeliner, she suggested resting your hand on your cheek. Use liquid eyeliner on the top lids and a crayon to line the bottom lids, stopping well short of the inside corner of the eye. "Low-key cheeks" are in, so blusher should be applied sparingly.

A secret for making lipstick last longer is to use a pencil along with lipstick, Birken said. After outlining the lips with the pencil, apply your lipstick with a lipbrush, then color your lips with the pencil.

"Makeup should take you no more than 15 minutes to apply," she said, and with the exception of lipstick and powder, it should last 8 to 10 hours.

Birken will be offering makeup seminars this fall at Richvale and Ed Sackfield community centres in Richmond Hill, and at the Dufferin and Clark Community Centre in Vaughan.

Toronto makeup artist up for Emmy Award

When the 47th annual Emmy Awards are presented in Los Angeles on Sept.10th, there will be many crossed fingers across Canada.

Beverley Schechtman of Toronto, and Kevin Haney of Los Angeles, have been nominated for Best Make-Up in a Mini-Series or Special for The Show Formerly Known as the Martin Short Show, broadcast May 20,1995.

It is the only Emmy nomination the show has received.

The team used prosthetics, paint, dentures, and hair pieces to transform Martin Short into Forrest Gump and Kato Kaelin, Jan Hooks to Brett Butler, Faye Dunaway and David Letterman's mum, and Joe Flaherty into Lyle Lovett.

Fans of the old SCTV comedy show and the more-recent CODCO will be familiar with Schechtman's work.

She transformed Short into Pierre Trudeau, Beverley D'Angelo into Tammy Faye Baker and the entire cast of CBC's CODCO into everyone from Barbara Walters to Dolly Parton.

Schechtman trained as a commercial artist, her favorite course being sculpting. She started her career in the fashion business, readying models for color photography. But it was sculpting that provided an excellent springboard to her work with prostheses to reshape famous faces.

Body-hugging body-suits back in fashion

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Mandi Imports, Canada's exclusive distributor of Cosabella Body Fashions, recently celebrated its 10th anniversary with a fashion show previewing Cosabella's fall collection.

The models wore every style of body-suit imaginable — long sleeve and sleeveless, with turtle, mock turtle, scoop, round and V-neck — in a wide array of colors and fabrics — velvet, cotton, tulle, and satin. The body-suits were teamed with scarves, sarongs and black double-layered tulle pants.

Cosabella, an international company based in Italy, has all its body-wear manufactured there. The company's strengths are the uniqueness of the color and patterns and the fabric combinations, according to Perry Tonus, president of Mandi.

For example, flocked or raised velvet is combined with tulle for an elegant evening look. Another innovative look is the tulle body-suit with mohair collar and cuffs. The body-suits, which all stretch to fit the body, come in small, medium and large.

Mandi, a family-run operation — Tonus runs the company with his parents and sister — supplies more than 500 high-end boutiques across Canada. He said Cosabella was originally a lingerie company "which evolved with needs of women from teddies to body-wear pieces."

Consequently Mandi had to find new customers. "We evolved from supplying lingerie to supplying the best boutiques in all the cities of Canada," he said.

Cosabella, which targets career women aged 25 to 55, retails from $70 for a cropped top, to $300 for a floral crushed velvet body-suit for evening wear.

One of the new fall products is the ankle-length black empire-waisted evening dress with a textured velvet bodice and double layered tulle skirt. The layered tulle is also used for the black full-legged pants.

As for fall colors, the palette is very diverse, Tonus said. "It's taking no direction and it's taking every direction." But silver and gold are not as strong as in previous years, he said.

In the last two years, the style of the body-suits have changed: Cosabella carries few body-suits made of loose-fitting material which drape the body, because the body-hugging garments have become more fashionable, Tonus said. "The body-hugging material is so soft it breathes allowing for movement and comfort."

Cosabella is available at these stores: Bottega Bertolucci, 875 Eglinton Ave. W.; Accessity, 136 Cumberland St.; Paola Di, 3357 Yonge St.

The Casual Way launches new Liz Claiborne line

Liz Claiborne's new Fall sportswear fashions will be launched Sept. 30 at the Casual Way store on Yonge St. north of Eglinton.

The collection will feature classic career and work wear, Liz Sport for casual work and play, Lizwear for weekends as well as knitwear.

The Casual Way is the only independent store in Toronot which carries all four Liz Claiborne sportswear divisions. Earlier this year the store introduced the first ever Lizwear Shop, featuring Lizwear for weekend dressing, fun and play.

Andrew's fills demand for better womenswear

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Andrew's, the women's department store in Hazelton Lanes, exudes panache and style with its elegant cream decor — complete with a baby grand — regular live jazz and popular music, and its bottomless pot of fresh Colombian coffee.

The three-year-old store, established in the midst of the last recession, expanded over the summer: 2,000 square feet of retail space were added to the existing 10,000-sq.-ft. store.

Co-owner Darren Mason said Andrew's is meeting the demand for better womenswear, filling a vacuum that was created when some of the higher-end retail stores collapsed during the last recession.

The store carries many lines of clothing with modern yet classic styling from Europe, he said. "Our product for the most part is exclusive lines, fashion-styling one cannot find anywhere else in North America."

Andrew's is a family operation. Mason and his two sisters, Beverley Lerner and Cheryl McEwen run the store, but they are guided by their mother, Joyce Mason, a 25-year veteran of the fashion business. She owns the Village Shops.

"My mother has tremendous vision for retail," Mason said. "She very carefully guides us, yet she allows us the freedom to make the decisions and make the mistakes to learn."

The staff of 30 sales associates work in the giant sportswear department or one of five other departments — evening wear, outerwear, lingerie, accessories and cosmetics — and have "extensive product knowledge," Mason said. They are trained to listen to the customer, providing service to those who want it and backing off if a customer is more comfortable on her own, he said.

Mason and his sisters spend most of their time on the floor, to gain an understanding of their customers' needs. That knowledge helps them on buying trips, he said.

"There's a lot of product out there. You have to be very particular. You have to have a clear definition of what your customer is looking for."

When Mason and Lerner look at various lines of clothing, they evaluate the garments in terms of fit, style, fabric and the combination of all those features, he said.

"We have to ask ourselves if it is worth the investment. There has to be a $400 value in a jacket or coat of that price. The label is the last thing we look at."

The prices at Andrew's are reasonable, Mason said. "For the most part you won't find prices cheaper anywhere else in the world. We price them [garments] extremely fairly. They're investment pieces that are meant to last. We guarantee it."

In all the departments together, the store carries hundreds of lines, offering customers a large selection of products, he said. One company Andrew's is showcasing is K.S., a contemporary European line of sportswear. "K.S. blends a lot of different styles and images in a very interesting way and appeals to a diverse clientele," Mason said, adding that the store expanded to "provide K.S. with an appropriate arena."

Andrew's mixes and matches different lines to create a classic international look. For example, a short red and black plaid jacket by Gerry Weber is teamed with black trousers and red cape by Weinberg for a striking look with simple lines.

Mason credits Lerner for creating this look and many of the other ensembles displayed throughout the store. "Beverly has a great sense of seeing a line and how to put it together."

Mason said the store strives to maintain a balance between esthetics and business. "Fashion and retail are very different. To be successful you have to take the reality of retail and the fantasy of design and package it in a nice environment with good service."

Beauty SHOP

By CAROL WISE

When you enter the cosmetic section of your favorite department store, do you feel anxious? Are your thoughts something like this: "Get me out of here!" "Help!" or simply, "Where do I begin"?

If this sounds familiar, don't be alarmed. You are not alone. Purchasing cosmetics can be overwhelming. However, autumn is here and with it comes the necessity for new cosmetics.

The following is a list of what's new in the cosmetic world, as well as some helpful hints to make your shopping experience successful, value-focused and fun.

Organize your cosmetics and eliminate what you no longer use. This will help avoid repeat buying. Make sure you have ample time to spend checking all the different makeup counters.

Talk to the makeup representative for the product line that you fancy and be sure your ideas of beauty are similar. Have the products applied before making your purchase. Often, what looks good in the container doesn't look good on you and vice-versa.

Glamor has made a dazzling comeback. The fashion runways are filled with flirty glitz. Neutral and barely there makeup is becoming a look of the past. This new femininity must be set off with real makeup colors.

SKIN CARE

During the fall months, the humidity in the air gradually decreases. You will find your skin becoming dryer and perhaps dehydrated. Choose a beauty cream to keep it soft and subtle.

LANCOME, Primordiale is a revitalizing solution that promises to make your skin look rejuvenated in one week — a spectacular result of a new, original active-ingredient transport system, the "Nanocapsule," containing pure Vitamin E. This formidable antidote helps to combat deformations which damage the cells.

FOUNDATION

To keep that healthy glow of the summer months, apply a foundation that is one shade darker than your natural skin tone.

ELIZABETH ARDEN, Flawless Finish Complete Control Matte Makeup is a water based, oil-controlling foundation that gives an expert long-lasting matte finish. It contains silica beads and kaolin that act as blotters, absorbing oil, not water, so the skin's moisture balance is maintained. It also contains anti-oxidants to neutralize free radicals.

Flawless Finish Dual Perfection Makeup is a versatile foundation that's fast, flexible and portable. Applied with a wet sponge for fuller coverage, a dry sponge for sheer coverage. It is ideal for touch-ups throughout the day.

BLUSH

A natural blushed effect can be achieved by applying color high on your cheekbone and blending well.

LANCOME, Blush Subtil is an oil free powder blush great for oily skin. The new color for fall is Miel Glace, a honey copper color that will give you a very natural yet healthy look.

Blush Majeur is a brush-on cream cheek color. For a radiant youthful finish, this no-color glow, shimmered with warm pink can be used alone, over blush or all over the face.

HAIR

This season's glamor do's are definitely influenced by the '60s era. Hair designer, Daniel Fiorio, says, "Lots of volume at the crown, wispy bangs with clean sleak lines will be the most popular look for fall '95. Instead of the '60s tease we have the '90s cut, which means the volume will be cut into the shape. Hair color should be luminous, adding maximum brightness to your face."

EYES

Eye makeup for the fall will be well defined with shades of color. Emphasis should be on the eyebrow to create structure and balance.

CHANEL, Le Soureil de Chanel is a unique compact containing the complete eyebrow beauty solution. This compact contains three perfect brow shades, three tools for application and a magnifying mirror that permits extreme precision.

LANCOME, Artliner creates an intensely precise line in a single sweep. Its supple nib outlines the edge of the lashes with a velvety matt finish. Its easy to apply, even for a non-expert. This technique will make your eyes appear larger and more dramatic.

ELIZABETH ARDEN, Eye Fix is the perfect solution to long-lasting eye makeup. It allows eye makeup to glide on like silk and controls streaking, creasing and fading.

LIPS

Again lips are the focal point of the face. Keep them looking soft, and kissable.

BIOTHERM, Soin des Levres is an optional solution to dry lip care. This highly concentrated hydrating cream combines nutritious plant oils and beeswax to keep your lips looking and feeling soft. It also offers both free radical protection and UV protection.

ELIZABETH ARDEN, Lipfix Creme creates an invisible barrier that helps control lipstick bleeding and feathering. It cushions vertical lines and conditions lips. Use this wonder cream and keep your smile looking youthful.

SIGNATURE: Lipman unveils new look

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Do you wear your Marci Lipman sweats to work on Casual Fridays? Now you can wear Marci Lipman designs to the office five days a week.

Marci Lipman, known for her casual art-to-wear — works of art on sweats and T-shirts — just unveiled the Signature Collection, a new line of casual clothing which is both stylish and versatile.

"We wanted to offer women a collection of clothing that could be worn to the office, out for dinner or to pick up kids," Lipman said recently in an interview.

The Signature Collection, which was introduced for the fall, features velour vests and mini-skirts, cuffed ribbed velour leggings with drawstring tunics, and oversized shirts teamed with leggings. Other fabrics in the collection include cotton jersey, flannel and baby Sherpa fleece.

Many of the items come in neutral colors such as taupe, oatmeal, charcoal and black and can be teamed with flannel and cotton tops with motifs such as fall leaves, caribou and bear paws. These patterned tops reflect her classic designs, Lipman said.

"We want people to have the feeling it's still Marci Lipman, but it's a new look."

The new look was triggered by her "desire for something other than fleece" and her need for a new creative direction, she said. "After 10 years of doing art on clothing I was ready for a change."

But the departure from the art-to-wear — which will still be manufactured and marketed by Lipman under the Classics label — was as much a business decision as a creative one, she said.

Other manufacturers had inundated the retail market with art on clothing, a concept Lipman pioneered 10 years ago, she said.

"I could feel it [the time for a change] coming the last few years; there was so much art on clothing."

But she also took a cue from her customers. They were not returning as often to buy her clothing, because the art-to-wear pieces never went out of style, she said.

Laura Hogg models this velour vest, a velour mini skirt and the Fall Fantasy scoop neck shirt. All together, these cost $150.

"Fashion that never dates has its pros and cons. We did not want to lose our regular customers."

She added that relaxed attitudes about work attire convinced her the time was opportune for launching a new sophisticated line.

Some of the oversized shirts in the Signature Collection, such as the polar fleece jacket with polar bear paw design and flannel caribou print shirt, can be worn by both men and women.

The latter two items are also available in children's sizes, along with a full children's collection that includes plaid flannel dresses, pants and vests, a velour grouping and a variety of art-to-wear sweats and sleepwear.

You can purchase any of the Marci Lipman collection at one of seven stores in Ontario, and the art-to-wear fashions are available at approximately 400 retail outlets across Canada.

Marci Lipman stores in the Toronto area are located in the Eaton Centre, Sherway Gardens, Hazelton Lanes, 2631 Yonge St. and 231 Avenue Rd.

Roots branches into eyewear

Roots Canada and Centennial Optical recently announced the launch of Roots Vision and Roots Sun prescription eye wear and sunglasses. Centennial Optical is one of Canada's leading suppliers of eye wear and lenses. Roots is one of Canada's most successful retailers of quality leather goods and athletic wear.

This dynamic team is now bringing us eye wear that offers both quality and the ultimate in style.

The ophthalmic line will consist of over 50 styles of casual sporty shapes with exclusive Roots detailing. The Roots Beaver, one of the country's most recognizable symbols, will detail the temple of many frames.

These simple yet elegant frames are made by the world's best manufacturers in Italy and around the world. Available in muted earth tones and classic shapes and finishes, the line is aimed at the Roots customer and the discerning public that appreciates style, comfort and quality.

"Roots Vision will be attractive to people of all ages, particularly for our price points and style," says Michael Budman, Roots co-founder.

Roots Vision will be available at all Roots outlets in Canada and at leading optical outlets across the country. The price points will range from $89.95 to $149.95.

Toronto designer offers fashion ideas and tips

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Among fashion leaders in-the-know, Wayne Clark is perennially one of Toronto's brightest lights. With shocking enthusiasm and joie de vivre, his creations can be divided into two categories: dramatic collections created for the press, and classic dresses, gowns and sportswear for the retail customer.

All Clark's designs evolve from his belief that women need to feel comfortable.

Wayne Clark

Interview with Wayne Clark

At the age of 10, Clark knew he wanted to spend his life designing clothing for women. Exotic dreams for a boy from Calgary. After completing stints at the Alberta College of Art and Sheridan College, Clark was awarded a Canadian Fashion Industry Scholarship and soon jetted off to London, England, where he apprenticed at Hardy Amies.

He soon won acclaim as a costume designer for the movie, The Romantic English Woman.

Today his designs appear regularly in films and on television. His Toronto-based office takes control of the complete fashion process from concept to shipping. He is intent on producing well-designed, beautifully made clothing for women.

I recently spoke to Clark about his fashion ideas.

Q. What is the hottest look for Fall '95?

A. The return of glamor is the big look for Fall '95. Chic, tailored suits, opulent gowns, lots of shine, sparkle, furs and jewels.

Q. How does a woman who doesn't have a perfect figure choose a dress?

A. Every woman has something she dislikes about her body and something she likes. Buy a dress that highlights the feature you like. If you like your legs, buy short dresses, or if you like your bust, look for something with an interesting neckline. The worst thing you can do is to buy clothes that are too small. Just because you can squeeze into a Size 6 doesn't mean you should.

Q. How can I get the best bang for my buck on a '90s budget?

A. Buy a few well made classic pieces in neutral colors. Accent them with things from clearance centres, discount stores or vintage shops. Don't buy poor quality jackets. Economize on skirts, pants and blouses — never the jackets.

Q. Is black the best color for evening?

A. Absolutely. Black is the only color that works with everything.

Q. How about fashion and economy?

A. Either the economy has turned around or people are just tired of feeling badly dressed. Perhaps everyone has decided to eat less and dress more.

Q. Do you have a motto?

A. We have a motto we try to stick to: "If it's not sexy, don't bother."

Wayne Clark's fashions are available at many of Toronto's fashion boutiques, such as, Holt Renfrew, Joy Cherry and Camari.

Korry's owner considered an authority on menswear

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On a recent visit to Korry's Clothiers for Men on the trendy cafe-lined strip of the Danforth, there were as many women shopping for menswear as men.

In the front of the store, one woman instructed her husband to try on a grey tweed blazer. She then chose a pair of charcoal pants to match and asked the salesman for a size 38. "Size 36," the husband countered.

"He still thinks he's a (size) 36," the woman told the salesman. "Bring the 38s." There was no further protest from the husband and the couple left Korry's with the blazer and size-38 trousers in hand.

Throughout the store there was no question which sex was in charge of buying the power suits. The men stood around sheepishly as their mates consulted with sales staff.

Most men take their wives with them when they buy clothes because they don't trust themselves to make the right decision, Saul Korman, the owner of Korry's, said. "Most men don't understand fashion."

But Korman certainly doesn't fall in that category. A fashion commentator and writer, he is considered to be one of the leading authorities on men's clothing in Toronto. His reputation is built on firm footings: he's been in the clothing business for 43 years.

Korry's sells a wide range of mid- to high-priced clothing and accessories from leisure wear — sweaters, vests, sport shirts and slacks, to business wear — suits, blazers and dress shirts.

Longer jackets with three and four buttons for single breasted and three by three, and three by two buttons for double breasted are a new look for the fall, Korman said.

"But not everybody is comfortable with this look. [When you choose a jacket] the bottom line is comfort."

Natural colors like browns, olives and charcoals are this year's big fall colors, however, the classics are integral to any wardrobe, he said.

"If you only have money to buy one suit buy navy. The navy suit is in 12 months a year."

A second suit should be grey or taupe, but men with grey hair should steer clear of grey, he added. A suit if it is well-cared for should last five years, he said.

For the man with a limited budget, three out of six or seven shirts should be solid white because "white makes a statement," but if white doesn't suit you then choose solid cream or light blue shirts, Korman said.

Mandarin-collar shirts have become very popular, he said. "A high mandarin collar goes well with a tuxedo. "After last year's Academy Awards — everyone in Hollywood was wearing one — we had people in here next day asking for mandarin-collar tuxedo shirts."

For a casual look Korman likes to mix and match items from different collections. On one of the mannequins a pair of Versace wool diagonal twill pants in brown is teamed with a beige and brown plaid bouclé sports shirt by Haupt. "I think the detail makes this look exciting," he said.

He is not a fan of Casual Fridays because too many people are interpreting dressing down as a licence to look sloppy, he said. "I don't want to be served by a bank clerk wearing torn jeans. I'm not against casual but there's a difference between casual and looking unkempt."

TRISTANO ONOFRI – LE SALON

NOT AVAILABLE IN STORES

That's right. This collection designed by Tristano Onofri of Germany, is available in Canada exclusively through Le Salon and is presented in a manner guaranteed to appeal to women whose priorities include personalized service and undivided attention to detail and quality.

Tristano Onofri styling is intended for the sophisticated woman of the nineties. The clothing reflects the image of a dynamic, vibrant woman who denands quality and function in an exciting and unique concept.

With 15 years at ESCADA behind her, Helene Laniak understands luxury and the women who buy it. So when she and her dad Peter Laniak, recently retired President & CEO of ESCADA-USA, decided to go into business together, they were determined to offer the highest level of comfort and service. Their new enterprise, Le Salon, is based in Montreal's Hermes Building. Le Salon is the center of a network of fashion consultants, each operating her own business and servicing her own clients.

Presently there are fashion consultants in Vancouver, Toronto, Ottawa, Quebec City and Montreal with more cities targeted for next season.

"We feel that this is the way of the 90's" says Helene Laniak. "With most of the carriage trade retailers gone, we can better service the client and pass on the savings to her as well. Clients are treated like invited guests and there is absolutely no pressure to buy. We want our guests to be comfortable and happy and to come back again and again."

Le Salon is set up as a living room where associates gather twice a year to view the collection and attend training seminars.Each consultant gets the sample line for a week during which time she books appointments in her home.

The collection, exclusive to Le Salon in Canada, is extensive, 160-170 pieces plus handbags and belts. Suits range from $1400 - $1600, but, says Laniak, it offers the value the consumer wants. And because of Le Salon's low overhead, customers buy it about 30% below retail.

Unlike cash-and-carry home shopping parties, customers have to think like retailers – ordering merchandise now for delivery in five months or so. They select from the sample-line, using garments from a previous season to check their size, and leave a 20% deposit. The balance is payable on delivery, "This is a luxurious, personalized and fun way for women to shop," says Laniak, who is confident of the concept's growth potential.

Tristano Onofri's Autumn/Winter collection is now available at Le Salon and his new creations for Spring/Summer '96 will be previewed soon.

An Israeli breakfast beckons

Jerusalem Dateline

Nearly every visitor to Israel has responded with great enthusiasm to what the world knows as "the Israeli breakfast." Always set out as a buffet, such breakfasts are truly impressive. Even the simplest of such offerings will include a display rich enough to make a lasting impression on all of the senses. Bright oranges, apples of marvellous rosiness, long yellow pears, large sweet green, yellow and red peppers, flame red tomatoes, slices of green and yellow melons and plump deep green cucumbers will be placed on the same table, side by side. Next to that abundance there may be various types of large, freshly baked country breads, several types of herring, a remarkable variety of cheeses, yogurt, buttermilk, creams and hard boiled, soft boiled, poached, and scrambled eggs. A variety of dishes, hot and cold, based on literally hundreds of the combinations that such ingredients can yield, will also be offered.

Even though nearly every hotel in Israel offers such morning feasts for its guests, such breakfasts are at their esthetic and gastronomic height when they are found in a kibbutz dining room. It is almost as if the pioneering spirit of the kibbutz is a fitting backdrop for this munificence. It was, after all, some 50 years ago on the kibbutz that such meals originated. In those days, nearly all the kibbutzniks started their day in the fields at 4 or 5 a.m., and by 7 or 8 had worked up enough of an appetite to do justice to such abundance.

AVOCADO AND POMEGRANATE SALAD

(Serves 4 to 6)

2 ripe avocados
Lemon juice as required
1 pomegranate
¼ lb. of black grapes

For the sauce:
1 tsp. sugar
¼ cup kosher white wine vinegar
2 tbsp. corn oil
1 tbsp. walnut oil
¼ cup mint, chopped
Salt and pepper to taste

Peel the avocados, remove the pits and slice into thick slices. Drop the slices into a bowl containing water and lemon juice as this will keep them from turning black.

Cut the pomegranate in half and crush it over a bowl to remove and collect the seeds. Wash the grapes and mix them with the fruit.

Put all of the sauce ingredients in a glass jar, screw the lid on firmly and shake vigorously for 1-2 minutes. Pour the sauce over the avocado and fruit and toss well before serving.

MIXED CHEESE SALAD

(Serves 4 to 6)

2 medium cucumbers, peeled
¼ lb. each cottage cheese and crumbled kosher feta cheese
¼ cup onion, grated and drained
1 green pepper, seeded and chopped finely
¼ cup each lemon juice and olive oil
Salt and black pepper to taste
Sprigs of fresh mint for garnish

Halve the cucumber lengthwise, score with the tines of a fork, sprinkle with salt and let stand for 30 minutes.

In mixing bowl combine the cheeses with the onion, green pepper, lemon juice and olive oil. Mix thoroughly and season generously with pepper and a moderate amount of salt.

Drain the cucumber and cut into small cubes. Mix into the cheese mixture. Transfer to a shallow serving bowl. Garnish with the mint sprigs and let stand in a cool place for ½ hour before serving. Serve with fresh bread.

Plan ahead and you can enjoy 'crazy brisket'

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

The start of a New Year is a special time. On Rosh Hashanah we gather together with friends and family to eat, pray, repent and of course, eat again. Actually, when you think about it, on Yom Kippur we do basically the same thing only it's eat, pray and repent and after what seems like 24 years and not 24 hours, eat again.

The High Holy Day meals always include a lot of planning, shopping and cooking. So it goes without saying that when it becomes your responsibility (and pleasure) to be host to the "family" meals the task might seem a little overwhelming.

First of all there are all those pesky little decisions that everyone has a different minhag for. Do you dress for services before or after you eat? Flowers and good china or everyday dishes? How early should everyone arrive in order to eat and get to services before all the good seats are taken? Then there's the menu. Soup or no soup? Beef or fowl or both? Apples and honey with the meal or as a separate part of the dessert. Dessert before or after services?

The first thing you need to do is relax. Serving the first meal of the holidays just before or after that first service is a mad and crazy rush for everyone. Nobody has enough time (or burners) to make everything they want.

There is no one correct way to prepare for the holiday meals (Ashkenazi and Sephardi differences don't count). The best solution to all these questions is not necessarily what your mother or mother-in-law suggests or what your neighbors do or even what the rabbi down the block does. It's whatever works for you within the framework of what your time, space, desire and finances will allow.

I do, however, have some advice that might prove helpful. Take from the list what works for you and forget the rest. As for the recipes, they are variations of classic soup, brisket, chicken and rice dishes that have been served at Rosh Hashanah and erev Yom Kippur tables for generations.

1. Challah and wine are always appropriate.

2. Never, ever, season anything with a lot of salt and then serve it to people heading out the door for services. There's nothing like standing there for Kol Nidre and realizing you need a drink of water.

3. Avoid serving anything that stains (beets, raspberries, and tomato sauce are big no-no's). Inevitably, someone will spill something on themselves (usually it's a child) and it's much easier to hide a light stain than a big red one.

4. Water should be the beverage of choice. It's the one drink that's guaranteed not to make you even more thirsty. To give the water a little bit of a festive look you can place slices of lemon, lime and/or orange in the glasses with crushed ice.

5. Make as much of the meal ahead of time as possible. Save those last minute recipes for a time when you actually have time.

6. Enlist everyone's help. If guests offer to bring something or offers to help and you really want to do all the cooking suggest that they bring wine, challah, fruit, flowers or that they come over to help you set the table. Not only are you saving yourself the time of preparing or picking up these items it allows your guest to feel the joy of preparing for the holiday.

7. Serve buffet or family style if possible. Making individual dishes and serving them guarantees that you'll be ready to sit down just as everyone else is finishing.

CRAZY BRISKET

5 to 6 lb. brisket
2 tsp. garlic, minced
1 medium onion
2 tbsp. red vine vinegar
¼ cup red wine
½ cup oil
¼ cup honey
¼ cup Coca Cola (yes, Coca Cola)
3 tbsp. ketchup
1½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 tsp. paprika

Place the garlic and onion in a food processor or blender and process until onion is minced. Add the remaining ingredients (except the brisket) and process until well blended. Pour the marinade over the brisket, cover, and let set for 1 to 2 hours at room temperature or overnight in the refrigerator. Cook in a covered roasting pan at 300 degrees for approximately 1 hour per pound. When the brisket is done (very tender) remove it from the oven and let cool. Then refrigerate. The brisket will slice better the next day. Remove the hardened fat and discard. To reheat, place the sliced brisket in the sauce, cover and warm. Serves 10 to 12.

Food

Apples are a seasonal treat

Isn't it lucky that the Rosh Hashanah custom of eating apples coincides with their peak season in Ontario and Quebec?

Foodland Ontario and Best Foods offer these great ideas.

APPLE OATMEAL SQUARES
(Makes 12 squares)

1 cup all-purpose flour
1 cup quick-cooking rolled oats
½ cup firmly-packed brown sugar
1 tsp. nutmeg
½ tsp. salt
¾ cup butter
6 medium Ontario apples
¼ cup sunflower seeds

Combine flour, oats, sugar, nutmeg and salt. Cut in butter until mixture is crumbly. Measure out ½ cup, and set aside for topping. Press remaining oatmeal mixture evenly in bottom of greased 9-inch square pan.

Peel and core apples; cut in lengthwise halves. Place cut side down on oatmeal base. Add sunflower seeds to reserved crumb mixture and sprinkle over top. Bake 375F for 40 to 45 minutes. Cut into squares and serve warm or cooled.

HERBED CHICKEN

6 lb. chicken, cut into pieces
2 tsp. garlic, minced
1 cup oil
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. onion powder
½ tsp. ground pepper
½ tsp. oregano, dried
¼ tsp. basil
2 cups flour
2 tsp. paprika

Place all the ingredients except the chicken, flour and paprika in a food processor or blender and process until blended. Arrange chicken in a baking dish and pour the sauce over it. Marinate for 3 to 4 hours or overnight, turning once or twice. Put the flour in a plastic bag and add the chicken, one or two pieces at a time. Shake to coat. Dip the chicken in the marinade again and place it on an ungreased foil lined cookie sheet. Sprinkle with paprika. Bake at 400 for 1 hour or until done. This may be made ahead of time, frozen and reheated. Serves 8.

PEAR COFFEECAKE
(Makes 10 servings)

1 cup all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
2 egg whites
¾ cup granulated sugar
⅓ cup skim milk
⅓ cup corn syrup
Cooking spray
2 medium pears, peeled, cored and cut in ½-inch wedges
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon

In large bowl combine flour, baking powder and salt. In small bowl whisk egg whites, sugar, milk and corn syrup together to blend well. Add liquid mixture to dry ingredients, whisking until smooth. Spread batter evenly in 9-inch cake pan sprayed with cooking spray. Arrange pears over batter, overlapping to cover. Sprinkle with mixture of sugar and cinnamon. Bake in preheated 350F oven 50-55 minutes, or until toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean.

Yoga instructor returns to his Jewish roots

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — One of Canada's foremost yoga teachers has returned to his Jewish roots.

Baal tshuvah Hart Lazer credits his yeshivah training for teaching him the discipline required to practise yoga and the spirituality he has learned through yoga for his return to Judaism.

"If someone had told me a year ago that I would return to Orthodox Judaism, I would have said there was no chance," he says.

Lazer left the fold at age 15. His family had moved from Winnipeg to Los Angeles when he was 10 and he was enrolled as a teen in a yeshivah whose ways he found too rigid.

"I would drop in on my family for Pesach from time to time, but that was the extent of my connection to Judaism and a Jewish community," he recalls.

Lazer returned to Winnipeg at the age of 21.

He discovered yoga about 10 years ago while he was living and working in Sioux Lookout, Ont., when a co-worker invited him to come with her to her yoga class.

"It was the first athletic activity I had ever tried that I couldn't master instantly," he recalls. "My body was aching and my ego was bruised after the first lesson. This was a challenge."

Shortly thereafter, he had the opportunity to participate in a yoga workshop with instructors from Washington and Kootenay, B.C. The workshop included both physical exercises and self-examination through writing exercises.

"The instructor from Kootenay confronted me in the workshop," Lazer recalls. "He told me it was time to stop screwing around with my life. I had been in and out of some unhealthy relationships. He invited me to study with him."

Lazer took a six-week leave of absence to go to Kootenay, where he underwent an intense program of psychological cleansing and learned meditation and chanting. Although initially he was reluctant to participate in the chanting, his instructor assured him the power was in the melody rather than the words and encouraged him to use Jewish religious terminology in his chanting.

Lazer subsequently moved back to Winnipeg and began practising yoga three to five hours a day. Before long, he was teaching. Seven years ago, he and a partner opened the Yoga Centre of Winnipeg.

Lazer teaches up to 200 students a week at the centre, from beginners to teachers in training, as well as another 100 students at outside venues. He is in demand across Canada and the United States for teacher training.

Last summer, Lazer read The Jew and the Lotus, an account of a meeting between the Dalai Lama (the religious leader of Tibetan Bhuddism) and a group of rabbis (including Zalman Schachter Shalomi) representing all branches of Judaism.

"If Zalman Schachter could daven in a Sikh temple, I thought that there might be a little opening for me to return to Judaism," he says. "I had also read Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz' book on tshuva. I thought it would probably be good for me to have a Shabbat, a day of complete rest."

Although he attends a Conservative synagogue, he "found Orthodoxy more challenging," he says. "I find it easier to be Orthodox in Winnipeg than in L.A. The [Chabad] rabbis here don't take a hard fundamentalist approach. They don't become defensive when I ask pointed questions."

His family is also getting into the spirit, he notes. Last November, his 14-year-old daughter asked to transfer to Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, and he and his wife work together to prepare the Shabbat supper Friday evenings.

"My Jewish studies have helped my teaching in some ways," Lazer notes. "There are many chassidic stories and parables comparable to yoga practice and philosophy. Overall, being a baal tshuvah has brought me a lot more personal peace and quiet which are hard to get if you are constantly on the go seven days a week."

1996 census to drop question about religion

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Next year's national census will not ask Canadians about their religion, but that doesn't mean the question will be dropped in later tallies.

Canadians consider official questions about their faith — as well as other queries about lifestyle and living arrangements — too personal, according to last month's annual report from Canada's Privacy Commissioner.

After consultations with Statistics Canada, the commissioner announced that questions about religion, fertility and dwelling status will be omitted in the 1996 census "in an effort to reduce intrusions."

The changes came after commissioner Bruce Phillips dealt with 26 specific complaints about the nature of questions in the 1991 census.

Some Jewish Canadians said at the time they thought questions about religion were too snoopy.

But officials both with StatsCan and in the Jewish community say the announcement from the privacy commissioner is academic, since the 1996 census would likely not have inquired about religion anyway.

Censuses in years ending with "6" are so-called "midpoint" tallies, and much less extensive than those conducted in years ending in "1," says Gustave Goldmann, an analyst with Statistics Canada.

Traditionally, the midpoint census has not included the religion question, Goldmann noted.

It's too early to say for certain, but there is an "assumption" that the census in 2001 will ask about religion, says StatsCan spokesperson Benoit Bouchard.

Both he and Goldmann agree that a 10-year span between questions about Canadians' faith provides adequate data.

The 1991 census not only inquired about religion but also about Canadians' ethnic origin. Among the choices for ethnic background was Jewish.

For statistical reasons, Ottawa considers being Jewish both a religion and an ethnicity.

Respondents to the 1991 tally were allowed to list up to four ethnic origins but only one religion.

The census found that 318,070 Canadians were Jewish by religion, while 369,565 people listed Jewish as one or more of their ethnic origins.

Those numbers were then analyzed and blended at Montreal's McGill University, which found that in 1991, Canada's Jewish population was 356,315. Excluded from the total were those who said they were Jewish by ethnicity but who stated another religion.

Numbers culled from the census have been a treasure trove for planners in the Jewish community, who use them to chart everything from intermarriage, migration and employment, to poverty, education levels and living arrangements.

Sheldon Maerov, executive director of the Council of Jewish Federations (Canada), told The CJN he hopes the religion question is not abandoned on the 2001 census, and that Canadians don't shy away from answering it.

Census data are "vital to our community. It's of the utmost importance for [questions about religion] to be included on the census."

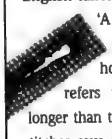
No crushed beetles, no duck shooting, and absolutely no pork.

For those of you who weren't apprenticed in Savile Row, we're pleased to translate this eccentric English tailors slang.


'A crushed beetle' is a badly made button hole. 'Duck shooting' refers to stitches that are longer than they should be (longer stitches save time). While 'pork' is parlance describing a made to measure suit rejected by the original customer and re-sold to another.
At A. Winestock we're glad to say you'll find none of the above.

What you will find is the very best in modern tailoring by Samuelsohn and Zegna, as well as an outstanding collection of casual wear by Mondo di Marco. There is however, nothing casual about our service. With 54 years of experience between them, proprietors Gary and Max will ensure those amusing English tailors won't be laughing at you.

Sailors' tack designed to take them to Atlanta

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 23, Adam Bookman has already seen more of the world than most people twice his age.

He has been to Mar del Plata, Argentina; Savannah, Ga.; Hyeres, France; Hamilton, Bermuda; Medemblik, Holland; Kiel, Germany; Barrington, R.I.; and Marblehead, Mass. Soon, he'll be going to Australia and Brazil.

In 1996, he hopes to cap off his 'round the world, jet-setting jaunt with a visit to Atlanta. However, Bookman won't be going as a camera-toting tourist. Instead, he hopes the flash guns will be going off around him and his partner Rob Fear, as they represent Canada at next year's Olympic Games in the 470 yacht class.

An accomplished sailor who's been bobbing on the briny deep since age six, Bookman has consistently placed among the top six Canadians in a series of international races going back three years.

Recently, he and Fear finished fourth among 21 Canadian boats, 33rd overall, at the 470 World Sailing Championships at the Royal Canadian Yacht Club in Toronto.

An Israeli duo, Ran and Nir Shental, finished third.

Although they had hoped to do better than 33rd place, Bookman said conditions made for an unpredictable week of races.

"The wind was really light and very shifty. It was strange sailing. Last year's world champion was 35th and the third place finisher last year was 75th," he said.

A disqualification in one of the races didn't help either. A strong current pushed their boat — and 12 others — over the start line ahead of time and earned them 70 points. Unfortunately, in competitive yachting as in golf, the lower the score the better.

Bookman believes that had they not been disqualified, they could've shaved 40-50 points off their total and finished around 20th overall.

A week or so after the Toronto event, Bookman and Fear were in Kingston, Ont., for the North American championships. There, they finished 13th out of 94 boats, third among Canadians.

Even though only one 470 boat (the name refers to its length in centimetres) will represent Canada at the Olympics, Bookman is confident it will be their yacht. They have been making steady progress since they teamed up two years ago, finishing second in the Canadian 23 and under championships in 1994 and placing first among Canadian boats (sixth overall) at Bermuda Race Week last May.

At the Canadian Olympic Classes Regatta in Toronto, held at the end of May, they tied for first overall.

Bookman and Fear have the rest of the year mapped out, with a series of competitive races designed to get them in tune by next May for Olympic trials in Vancouver.

In October, they'll be off to a regatta in Savannah, Ga., and in February, they'll head down to the land of the lambada, Brazil, for more competition.

"We're not seeing any snow this year. We're not too sad about that," Bookman said.

A graduate in political science at McGill University, Bookman is taking a year off from his studies to study the fine art of tacking to windward and executing a beam reach.

Bookman's early sailing skills were moulded by Ontario youth sailing programs operated under the auspices of the Ontario Sailing Association. His mother and stepfather, Carol and Bill Kassel, are members of the Island Yacht Club (his father is Steven Bookman). At age six, he was navigating "optimist" class boats, an overgrown bathtub with a sail mounted in the middle.

At 15, he was entering competitive races in the Laser 2 class and in 1993, he and Sarah Zeegen represented Canada at the Maccabiah Games in Israel in a 470.

"We didn't do so well. We came in sixth out of eight. The Israelis are really good 470 sailors and we didn't train enough together or bring our own boat," Bookman said.

He teamed up with Fear in the spring of 1993 and they've been improving ever since.

Each has his own tasks on board, whether its hauling on lines or trimming the sails. Doing so efficiently is the key to getting the 470 up to its top speed, around 20 knots (22 mph), Bookman said.

"When we're sailing, we really don't speak. It's key words, like 'ready' and 'ready to tack,' or 'hoist,' " he said. "We're starting to think alike."

Maccabi Canada president aims to set the record straight

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Roy Salomon wants to set the record straight. In fact, he itches to set the record straight.

His message is simple: Maccabi Canada is an honorable organization that chooses the best athletes for the teams it fields in regional and international competitions.

A recent story in The CJN in which criticism was levelled at Maccabi Ontario for the way athletes were selected to the tennis team at the recent Youth Games in Long Island was not representative of the way Maccabi does business, he said.

People read the article and said, "This isn't Maccabi. This isn't what it's about," Salomon, president of Maccabi Canada, said.

The best athletes are chosen for Maccabi teams, Salomon said, responding to the CJN story that suggested that sometimes nepotism played a part in athlete selection.

A former basketball player at the 1969 Maccabiah Games in Israel, Salomon said that sometimes athletes who feel they should have made a team are unhappy to have been rejected. They may blame others for it. There were even complaints about selections for the Maccabiah Games softball team, even though it went on to win the gold medal, he said.

Mistakes may have been made in athlete selection "but the intention is completely above board. There is no way anyone was favored for a team because of who they knew."

Roy Salomon

In addition, "there are no hangers-on who are sent to Israel" for the Maccabiah Games, Salomon said. "I've never heard of anyone going to the games unless they have done important work and were the most qualified person to do the work in Israel."

Turning to a subject near and dear to his heart, Salomon said "We want to work with the Jewish community centres ... in the development of athletes ... [We want] to get in contact with kids seven to nine years old and develop them so they can compete."

Maccabi Canada arranged exhibitions in swimming, wrestling, gymnastics and table tennis at selected summer camps attended by Jewish kids and plans to expand the program to Jewish schools this year, he added.

"Our primary goal is to bring as many of our young people to Israel as we can. We know when they're exposed to Israel, their commitment to Israel is enhanced," Salomon said.

Settlers divided over leaving homes: survey

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Thirty-two per cent of settlers would be willing to leave their communities if offered "reasonable" compensation, while 26 per cent would stay in the settlements under any conditions, according to a survey commissioned by Peace Now.

The telephone survey, which studied settlers' attitudes toward the peace process and asked whether they would be willing to move, was conducted August 17 among 419 Jews in the territories. The margin of error is 4.9 per cent.

Asked "if you would be willing to leave the settlement with your family for reasonable compensation," 15 per cent said they would "surely" be willing; another 17 per cent said they "think they would."

By contrast, 59 per cent said either they would surely not, or do not think they would be willing to leave for compensation. The rest were either undecided or refused to answer.

The poll found that the further the settlements are from Jerusalem, the greater the willingness is to leave, in places such as Ariel, Emmanuel, Alfei Menashe and Kiryat Arba.

Dr. Ella Heller, who carried out the survey, wrote that settlers can be divided into the 30 per cent whose motivations for moving to the territories were not ideological and who would be willing to leave; and a hard core of 31 per cent who are driven by ideology and are not willing to leave for compensation. Everyone else falls somewhere in between.

Asked what they would do "if your settlement will not be included in the state's boundaries in the final agreement with the Palestinians," 26 per cent said they would stay in the settlements under any conditions; 29 per cent said they will remain if the security remains in the hands of the Israel Defence Force; 25 per cent would prefer moving within the Green Line; eight per cent would move to another settlement in the territories; less than one per cent said they would leave the country; and the rest were undecided.

Among the poll's other findings:

- Forty-seven per cent of the settlers said they live in the territories for economic or quality of life reasons; 36 per cent for religious or nationalistic reasons; and 15 per cent for a combination of reasons.
- A majority of settlers — some 75 per cent — believe that in five years, they will be living in the same settlement they live in now; 11 per cent think they will be living inside the Green Line; five per cent in another settlement; and less than one per cent abroad. The rest did not know.
- Thirty-two per cent of respondents believe their settlement will be annexed to Israel; while seven per cent believe it will be evacuated and they will receive compensation.
- The majority — 44 per cent — believe their settlement will not be evacuated and their security will remain in the hands of the IDF.
- Twenty-five per cent of settlers defined themselves "in general" as "supporting the peace process between Israel and the Arabs," compared with a national figure of 57 per cent. Opposed to the process are 58 per cent, compared to 28 per cent nationwide.

Jewish Agency to quit education, absorption

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency will transfer to the government all responsibilities which duplicate those of government bodies, agency sources said last week.

The move is expected to lead to a budget cut of $150 million over the next four years, and will change the entire face of the agency, the sources said.

Agency chair Avraham Burg will announce details of how he would like to see the "new" agency at a special Zionist Executive meeting this week, which will be followed by meetings with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Under the new plan, absorption and education are expected be placed solely in the hands of the government. Burg would like to retain areas dealing with aliyah, Jewish education and Israel-Diaspora relations.

Population booming in Golan

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Scores of families have moved into the Golan Heights in the past few months, boosting the region's Jewish population.

Golan regional council officials revealed last Wednesday that 120 families have become members of moshavim and kibbutzim on the Golan in the past two months.

That's in addition to the mass influx of newcomers to Katzrin, which has experienced a population boom in the past 12 months and where there's a six-month waiting list for some rental housing.

Council officials say that despite uncertainties over the Golan's future, people were still coming to live there, while older residents show no signs of leaving.

Golan regional council chair Yehuda Wolman said the number of new families coming to live in the region could top the 1,000 mark within a year.

He said the council will continue to meet newcomers' needs in employment, housing and agriculture.

Plans will proceed regardless of any attempts by the government to block expansion and development, he vowed.

CECIL VINEBERG, FCA

The death occurred on Monday, August 28th, of Cecil Vineberg, FCA, a Partner Emeritus in the accounting firm of Richter, Usher & Vineberg which he first joined in 1940, on completing the CA exams in which he led the Province and placed second nation-wide.

Mr. Vineberg was soon admitted to partnership, and in association with the late William Richter and Cecil Usher built the firm's practice into one of the most widely respected in its field, serving a wide spectrum of business and industrial companies.

A frequent lecturer for the Quebec Order of Chartered Accountants, Mr. Vineberg was an acknowledged expert in tax law whose interpretation of major changes in legislation won him recognition across the country. He was an active member of the profession for many years and after his retirement from his firm, he remained a consultant with close ties to his successors who valued his guidance.

Mr. Vineberg will be remembered for his leadership role in many charitable endeavours, among them the Kidney Foundation and Combined Jewish Appeal. An avid golfer, he was a founding member of the Hillsdale Golf and Country Club, and had been President of both the Royal Canadian Golf Association and the Quebec Golf Association.

Cecil Vineberg is survived by his wife, the former Sally Strean and his two sons, David, a partner in the Richter Group, and Steven, a member of the faculty at Holy Cross College in Boston. There are also four grandchildren and one great-grandchild.

Israel asserts control in Jerusalem

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

As Israel and the Palestine National Authority (PNA) edged closer to finalizing the second phase of the Oslo agreement last week, they defused one more looming crisis — the chronic dispute over the presence of Palestinian institutions in East Jerusalem.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

The problem is not new. It has waxed and waned since Israel and the PLO forged an historic rapprochement two years ago.

Israel and the PLO agreed, both in the 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP) and in the May 1994 Cairo accord, that "the offices responsible for carrying out the powers and responsibilities of the (PNA) will be located in the Gaza Strip and in the Jericho area" pending the formation of a Palestinian council, or parliament.

Since then, the PNA — the governing body in Gaza and Jericho presided over by PLO chairman Yasser Arafat — has established a host of offices in the eastern sector of Jerusalem.

The Israeli government does not officially recognize these offices, regarding them as bridgeheads of Palestinian influence and sovereignty in a city it regards as its indivisible capital.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has repeatedly vowed to close Palestinian institutions linked to Palestinian self-rule in Gaza and Jericho. However, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, in a 1993 letter to Norway's foreign minister, promised that Israel would preserve the status quo of "all the Palestinian institutions" in Jerusalem.

The PNA, which considers East Jerusalem as its future capital, has taken advantage of this ambiguity in Israeli policy and interpreted the DoP in exceedingly broad terms.

Until last week, there were nine known Palestinian institutions in East Jerusalem, which Israel annexed in 1967.

They were the Palestinian Ministry of Religious Affairs, the Palestinian Energy Centre, the Palestinian Bureau of Statistics, the Office of the Mufti of Jerusalem and the Holy Land, the Palestinian Economic Council for Development and Reconstruction, the Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation, the Palestinian Health Council, the Palestinian Housing Council and, last but not least, Orient House.

Last week, the Israeli police announced plans to close three of the institutions — the Palestinian Health Council, the Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation and the Palestinian Bureau of Statistics.

Israel claimed they were illegal because they maintained direct relations with the PNA and engaged in political activities.

Initially, the PLO threatened to defy the closure order. The Palestinians argued that the institutions targeted by Israel were established before the emergence of the PNA and furthermore, claimed that they had no administrative or financial connection with the PNA.

But when it became clear that Israel would go ahead and close the institutions, the Palestinians relented and agreed to cease operations.

The recurring clash over the existence of such institutions clouds Israel's budding relationship with the PLO. Yet the work of completing the second phase of the Oslo agreement goes on.

Last week, in Cairo, Israel and the PLO signed a pact which gives the PNA in Gaza and Jericho new powers in the fields of labor, trade and industry, gas and petrol, insurance, postal services, statistics, agriculture and local government.

But the battle for Jerusalem, revolving around the functioning of Palestinian institutions in the city, has just begun.

The question now facing Israel is whether it should try to put the remaining Palestinian institutions out of business. It's a strategy strongly urged by the Likud bloc and the mayor of Jerusalem, Ehud Olmert.

Olmert, in particular, wants to shut down the operations of Orient House — the unofficial headquarters of the PLO in Jerusalem since 1991, as well as a flashpoint of constant tension between Israel and the PLO.

But so far, Israel has been unable to prove that Orient House, headed by PLO supporter Faisal al-Husseini, is directly linked to the PNA.

Law bars trials for soldiers

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general says too much time has elapsed to allow for the prosecution of Israeli soldiers who may have executed Egyptian prisoners of war.

In a statement last week, Michael Ben-Yair called the alleged killings of Egyptian PoWs during the 1956 Sinai Campaign and the 1967 Six-Day War "unlawful and intolerable."

But Israel's 20-year statute of limitations for criminal acts has expired, he added.

"As a result, there is no legal possibility of bringing to trial anyone involved in incidents that took place almost 40 years ago or 28 years ago."

In a letter to Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, Ben-Yair said he had reached the decision after reviewing appeals he received from public figures and citizens calling for an investigation into the incidents from both wars.

The controversy over the fate of Egyptian PoWs surfaced last month, when several Israeli veterans and historians came forward with claims that they had witnessed or participated in the killings.

Last week, an Israeli historian alleged that some 200 Israeli PoWs had been killed by Egyptian troops during the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

The allegations surrounding the 1956 and 1967 wars prompted Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to call on Israel to investigate and prosecute soldiers responsible for killing Egyptian PoWs.

Mubarak, interviewed on Israeli television, said the investigations could prevent a crisis between the two countries.

He also said he was ready to look into reports that Egyptian soldiers had killed Israeli PoWs.

"I am prepared to investigate the reports about the murder of Israeli soldiers," he said.

AVNET aids terror victims

"Together, we began compiling a list of all the families of terror victims we knew, in order to see how we could help them. At first, we started in Gush Katif because that's where we live. But eventually, we realized that the organization should be a national one that would strive to help terror victims all over Israel."

One of AVNET's first projects was a communal bar mitzvah for 18 youngsters from all over the country. Some, like Dahari's own son, had lost their fathers in terrorist attacks. Others were classmates injured in a 1994 suicide bombing in Afula. The ceremony was held in Jerusalem in the presence of the chief rabbi, and included a visit to the presidential residence, where the youngsters were greeted by President Ezer Weizman.

"It was an unforgettable experience for these boys, who have suffered a great deal," says Dahari. "And most of us wouldn't have had the strength to organize a bar mitzvah for our sons on our own."

The organization runs on small donations and a growing roster of volunteers like Adiella Gantz, a 24-year-old from Rehovot. "We advise the victims' families of their rights, organize activities for their children and provide a listening ear," says Gantz, who first heard of AVNET when she was flipping through a leaflet of volunteer projects compiled by the B'nai Akiva youth movement. She chose to volunteer at AVNET because its goals touched a chord in her.

"I lost many friends during my military service," she recalls. "The loss is painful. You can either sink in your grief or you can find something positive to do with it. I felt that by volunteering at AVNET I could turn my own experience into something positive."

Reopening wounds

Earlier this month, Gantz spent 10 days working at an AVNET-organized summer camp for the families of victims of terror.

"Bringing us together is in itself an invaluable service," says Leah Zvi Farag, one of the 120 people who participated in the camp. Her husband was stabbed to death by two terrorists near their Har Bracha home in Samaria (in the West Bank) seven years ago. She was 26 and pregnant with her fourth child at the time. The widow has since managed to start a new life; she remarried and has had three more children with her new husband.

"I was hesitant to participate in the camp. I didn't want to reopen the wounds," she says. "But I realized that until now neither I nor my children have had the chance to meet other people who have gone through the same thing. Sometimes my children ask: 'Why did it happen?' or 'Why wasn't Abba (Daddy) more careful?' I felt my children needed the chance to meet other children to talk about the things they haven't discussed until today."

Zvi Farag also felt obliged to participate in the camp in order to share her story with others.

"As someone who has managed to rebuild my life, I felt I had insights that could help others whose wounds are fresher than mine," she says.

One of those was Netanya resident Aviva Machpoud, who lost her husband, Shabtai, only seven months ago. He was killed while rescuing soldiers injured in the Beit Lid suicide bombing. A second bomb exploded while he was tending those wounded by the first one.

"Today is the first time I'm spending my birthday without my husband," she revealed on the last night of the camp, tears streaming down her face. "But thank God I have you, the family of AVNET. I came here with so much pain, with such a deep wound in my heart. I am leaving with at least some optimism and with the knowledge that at this place I have a home."

The camp was held — for the second year in a row — at the Yemin Orde educational youth village on Mount Carmel, which has, as Machpoud said, become a second home to terror victims. All families have a standing invitation to seek refuge any time at this scenic mountain village overlooking the Mediterranean Sea. The management provides room and board and even sends a mini-bus to bring them. For many, it is a desperately needed vacation.

"Right after every terror attack, the wounded and the families of the dead are in the media limelight. But by the next day, everyone has forgotten them," says Dr. Chaim Peri, director of the Yemin Orde village. "We try to be there for these families during the long struggle to rebuild their lives."

Yemin Orde is itself a refuge for troubled people. It is a home and school for 500 homeless youth, 80 per cent of them new immigrants. During the summer camp organized by AVNET these young people forged special ties with the children of terror victims.

"The boys of Yemin Orde were like big brothers to my child," says Machpoud. "He hadn't received so much attention and care since the tragedy."

Two graduates of Yemin Orde, who are now volunteers at AVNET, established the connection between the two organizations.

Peri likens the successful match to a story told by Rabbi Nachman of Brezlev. "It's a tale about someone who wanted to build the most perfect menorah in the world. He took all the broken pieces from many beautiful menorot and put them together to create a new one. This 'menorah of deficiencies' was the most perfect menorah ever made," recounts Peri. "We put traumatized children with homeless youth and emerged with something very beautiful — our own menorah of deficiencies."

Extradite Nazi killer, Costa Rica urged

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica — A member of the U.S. Congress last week personally delivered a letter, signed by some 60 other Congress members, to the president of Costa Rica, demanding that an accused Nazi war criminal be extradited to Ukraine.

Bodhan Koziy, who apparently has been living in a suburb of the capital city of San Jose for the last decade, was a Ukrainian police official during World War II.

The letter, handed to Costa Rican President Jose Figueres last week by Rep. Michael McNulty (D-N.Y.), states: "On the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II, we ask our ally in fighting the Nazis to remove its sanctuary for one of the perpetrators of Nazi genocide.

"Judges in the United States and prosecutors in Germany affirmed that Koziy was a Nazi policeman in Ukraine, where he shot and killed — among others — a 4-year-old," the letter said.

"Koziy has had haven in Costa Rica for the past decade. We urge you in the strongest terms to consider how the international reputation of Costa Rica is suffering. As a country known for its defence of human rights, Costa Rica should end its sanctuary to a known Nazi murderer."

If the Costa Rican government does not respond to the renewed effort to extradite Koziy, a formal complaint will be registered with the UN Human Rights Commission, and the U.S. Congress will be approached to take diplomatic action against Costa Rica, said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress.

In the past, the Costa Rican government "stonewalled us," Steinberg said.

No one at the Costa Rican embassy in Washington was available for comment.

Koziy, the former owner of a motel in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 1982 after a trial in Florida in which eyewitness testimony described the murder of the girl.

The U.S. Justice Department obtained a court order to deport him in 1984, but he fled to Costa Rica.

In 1986, Costa Rica refused the Soviet Union's request for Koziy's extradition. A year later, the Costa Rican government overruled a local court order to extradite him to the Soviet Union.

Swiss to be asked to unfreeze funds

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — A new initiative to regain Jewish funds deposited in Swiss banks during World War II is expected to emerge from a meeting of world Jewish leaders this month in Brussels.

Officials from European Jewish communities, Israeli government agencies and American Jewish organizations will meet Sept. 12 and 13 "to discuss broad issues across Europe" that affect Jews, said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

WJC President Edgar Bronfman will lead the conference, which is co-sponsored by the European Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization.

The conference is expected to demand that the Swiss government take steps to unfreeze funds and allow Holocaust survivors or inheritors to search for missing funds.

The media in Israel and elsewhere have reported that large amounts of money belonging to Holocaust victims are still being held in Swiss bank accounts.

Swiss banks, known for their privacy, have refused to release the deposits to relatives of the deceased without proper documentation and account numbers, much of which vanished during and after the war.

Estimates of wartime deposits range from tens of millions of dollars to nearly $7 billion.

The Swiss Bankers Association, the industry's leading organization, has said the numbers are inflated.

Some of the accounts may include funds confiscated from Jews by the Nazis, who then transferred the monies to Switzerland.

The German daily Bild reported last week that Heinrich Himmler, head of the Nazi SS and Gestapo, had transferred $800 million in cash and items to Switzerland during the war.

New York rabbis meet Arafat and PA security chief

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Three members of the New York Board of Rabbis met with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat and Palestinian security forces chief Nasser Yusef in Gaza last Wednesday. It was the first visit of its kind.

The three are part of a delegation of Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis, which represents 800 rabbis in the New York area (see News in Brief, p. 2).

Two delegation members objected strongly to the meeting with Arafat and demanded that it be canceled. Finally, they opted to stay in Jerusalem while the others went to Gaza as private citizens, and not as board representatives.

The mission to Israel, intended to express support for the peace process, was organized by the International Centre for Peace.

Israel-based peace centre director Ofer Bronstein said the controversial meeting with Arafat was requested by the rabbis before they arrived.

Bronstein said he had "never seen Arafat behave so cordially with anyone before. He took them by the hand and saw them to their car after the visit, taking a long time over the goodbyes. Arafat asked them to arrange meetings with leaders of the Jewish community on his visit to New York next month."

Rabbi Louis Frishman, president of the New York Board of Rabbis, said the meeting with Arafat was "extremely touching and worthwhile."

Rabbi Frishman, who is Reform, said "Arafat was very warm, he held our hands and insisted on calling us cousins."

Arafat explained that the word jihad (holy war), which he had used, meant construction and building, Rabbi Frishman said, "but I think he realized it was a mistake to use that term."

Rabbi Frishman was accompanied by Rabbi David Lincoln of the large conservative Park Avenue Synagogue in New York, and delegation head Rabbi Jay Rosenbaum.

Despite the public controversy, Rabbi Lincoln said he was convinced after meeting both left- and right-wing leaders that "the peace process would go on, no matter who was in power.

"This was made very clear to us. [Likud leader Benjamin] Netanyahu told us that he would meet Arafat [if the Likud comes to power], and the U.S. ambassador told us that the peace process is the key factor in the dynamics of Israel's economic prosperity.

"I am sure there will be rabbis who will protest and be angry [about the visit to Arafat], but I have to do what I think is right for me and my community," Rabbi Lincoln said.

Rabbi Jacob Rubenstein of the Orthodox Young Israel of Scarsdale, was one of the two rabbis who refused to meet Arafat.

He said that while all the rabbis on the mission support the peace process, there were feelings of "disenchantment and despair."

At their meetings with Israeli leaders, the rabbis queried Arafat's duplicity and the PLO's conduct, and were told of the concern, pain and atmosphere of crisis in parts of Israeli society, he said.

Appeal to allow denier into Australia rejected

CANBERRA — An appeal by British Holocaust revisionist David Irving of an administrative order barring him from entering Australia was denied last week.

Australia's Federal Court found that the order was "fair and justifiable" in its finding that Irving was not "of good character" for entry into Australia as a visitor.

The court based its finding on the fact that Irving lied under oath to a Canadian immigration adjudicator during a 1992 deportation hearing; lied under oath in affivadit evidence to the High Court of Justice in Great Britain; and on the fact that Irving was expelled from Germany in 1993.

Police to investigate leaders of settlers group

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli police officials will investigate the leaders of a Jewish settlers group on charges that include conspiracy.

The investigation will focus on the leadership of Zo Artzeinu (This is Our Land), which spearheaded protests against the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations to expand Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank.

But both Opposition leaders in the Knesset and settlers have become increasingly vocal, charging that government attempts to stifle such protests have led to repeated acts of police brutality.

"Freedom of expression is a basic right in a democratic regime, but public order is also a value that must be protected," said Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair of the decision to probe Zo Artzeinu.

Police officials said they had cause to investigate the group, because it published a pamphlet that detailed instructions on blocking the highways and coordinated a protest which blocked Israeli roads during the evening rush hour.

The group's leaders will be investigated on conspiracy to commit a crime, encouraging people to prevent police officers from doing their duty and obstructing an investigation.

Rabbi Banny Alon, a Zo Artzeinu leader, said on Army Radio that he welcomed the police investigation, because the group had "nothing to hide."

But members of the Opposition also say the government has created a climate in which the Israeli police commit acts of brutality against demonstrators.

The suggestion this week by a Knesset member that demonstrators may fire back if fired upon by the police has provoked a storm of controversy.

MK Rehavam Ze'evi of the right-wing Moledet Party complained about what he called the use of excessive force by police against protesters.

He said if the opposition parties assumed power, there would be a "blacklist" of police who hit demonstrators.

"If they use [tear] gas against us, we will consider it live fire and respond accordingly," he added.

Police Minister Moshe Shahal condemned the statements.

"This is a totally inappropriate declaration," Shahal said. "It is a kind of rebellion against law enforcers."

However, after consulting with the attorney general, Shahal decided not to press charges because the statements, he said, were made by a "politician whose opinions are known."

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported that Shahal had received information that right-wing extremists were planning to attack government ministers.

Shahal stepped up protective measures for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

He also called on right-wing leaders to moderate their statements in an effort to avoid inciting extremists.

In response, Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu called on the government to allow public debate, which he described as legal and democratic.

Other opposition members were critical of police behavior at demonstrations.

Likud MK Uzi Landau and others accused police officers of not wearing identity tags so they could beat protesters without being identified.

Yitzhak Levy of the National Religious Party asked the Knesset's legislative committee to address the legality of the methods used by police to disperse a Zo Artzeinu demonstration last week.

Levy said he had pictures and testimony showing that a number of police officers had either covered their name tags with tape or had identified themselves with false names.

Similar charges surfaced after Israeli police arrested seven Jewish settlers Wednesday as part of a clampdown on anti-government protesters allegedly causing disorder and harassing local Arab residents.

Police officials arrested four residents of the West Bank settlement of Yizhar near Nablus, accused of setting fire to a nearby Arab school and of firing shots into a neighboring Arab village about a month ago.

The police also arrested three other settlers suspected of trying to prevent the initial arrests.

All but two of the settlers were later released.

The residents of Yizhar charged that the police had entered houses without warrants, threatened people with their weapons and hit residents.

But the police denied the reports of brutality at Yizhar.

An official from the West Bank district police station told Army Radio that the settlers had tried to prevent the arrests by lying in front of police cars and throwing rocks.

A Taste of Hong Kong in the Heart of Toronto.

Toronto restaurant afficionados have been talking about it for months. Now it's here, and this is the perfect time to experience it for yourself. Lai Wah Heen, which means "luxurious meeting place," has achieved the superb quality, elegance and true character of the great Hong Kong restaurants.

Under the direction of renowned restaurateur, Alan Ip, Lai Wah Heen's chefs bring you the most recent trends in Cantonese cuisine – exotic herbs and spices from the Pacific Rim, skillful use of tropical fruits, and seafood dishes of exquisite refinement.

Try the skillet-seared filet of Garoupa, nested on seaweed, finished with crab bisque and topped with caviar. Or coffee-smoked mango fish, fresh from the smoker, cooled with citrus mayonnaise and fresh tropical fruits. For the more earth-bound palate, there is marinated chicken, baked golden brown in a bed of coarse rock salt. To complement any menu item, you can choose from a wine list featuring both new world and old world wines. The restaurant's sommelier will be happy to recommend a compatible vintage.

So call today to make a reservation – for an intimate dinner, for dim sum, or a sumptuous banquet for over 300. And discover a true Hong Kong dining experience – right here in Toronto!

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Portrait of the Artist: Fifty-seven-year-old painter David Nemtzov lives alone in the same one-bedroom apartment in a North York highrise that he first occupied when he came to Toronto 18 years ago. This "atelier" is cluttered with large oil paintings, mostly portraits (Nemtzov's specialty), as well as a diverse assortment of religious books in Hebrew, many dating from the last century.

"I like old books," says the artist, who often paints them in the hands of rabbis with equally antiquated faces.

In the centre of the living room is an easel upon which stands Nemtzov's latest work, a finely-wrought, highly realistic portrait of Jack Grossman, president and CEO of Billy Bee Honey Products Ltd., presented against a background of near-black. ("Rembrandt was my first love," Nemtzov confesses.) The commissioned work measures 24 by 30 inches and took the artist some 50 hours to complete.

In the last several years, Nemtzov has been commissioned to paint many corporate subjects as well as children, who are usually given more colorful backgrounds and particular poses to help establish age and character. He has also rendered likenesses of celebrities like Meryl Streep and Yehudi Menuhin, and rabbis such as the late Lubavitcher Rabbi Menachem Schneerson, Montreal Chief Rabbi Pinchus Hirschprung, and the Steipler Gaon of Bnei Brak, Israel.

Renowned violinist, Sir Yehudi Menuhin, is the subject of this oil on canvas painting by David Nemtzov.

"I did a portrait of the Bostoner Rebbe, and I sent it to him as a gift," he says. "He sent me a beautiful letter in return."

What about the rabbinical injunction against artistic representation of living beings?

"The only injunction is against sculpture," Nemtzov says. "The Rambam approves of anything other than three-dimensional pieces of art. But some rabbis don't want their portraits done; they won't pose."

In any event, posing isn't as important for artists as it once was, Nemtzov says. "People don't have the time to sit today. And with photography being what it is ..."

The British-born painter, who studied art in Cleveland and Toronto, insists that a good painting "speaks" to the viewer and goes far beyond the limits of a photograph in capturing a subject's nature. "A good painting has to be alive. It's not just an image of someone."

He brings forth canvas after canvas, places them one by one on the easel. One of them is a wonderful portrait of newlyweds, painted from a photograph 28 years after the wedding.

"I end up using the photograph as a source — that's what it is for me. What I have to do is go beyond the photograph, give each feature as much life as I can. If something is missing from the photograph, I have to complement it."

Photographs of contemporary rabbis have inspired him to paint full-fledged portraits because of the "antiquity and oldness" they exude, he says. "They show how a rabbi alive in this century — reading an old book, wearing an old gown — is still living in the olden times."

In Brief: Toronto-born music producer Bob Ezrin, whose clients have included Pink Floyd, Kiss, Rod Stewart and Peter Gabriel, returns here Sept. 11 and 12. He's delivering "his personal vision of the future" at the International Film Festival's Symposium '95, entitled Hot Media, Cool Concepts.

The Spirit of Survival, a presentation of words and music, features violinist Shony Alex Braun, artist Sophia Chatov and talk-show hostess Linda Pollack. At the Leah Posluns Theatre, Sun. Sept. 17, 7.30 p.m., sponsored by the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association.

Let There Be Light, an exhibition of the Israeli Artists Group in Toronto, is on view at the Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., Toronto, Sept. 11 to Oct. 11.

Bookstore cafe unique

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

What do John Grisham, Lauren Bacall, Jennifer Flowers, Gloria Steinem and former U.S. president Jimmy Carter have in common?

They have all signed their books at Liberties Fine Books and Music Cafe in Boca Raton, Fla., which is owned by a Canadian.

There is nothing quite like Liberties in the rest of North America, according to Howard Bregman, 32, whose family runs the Toronto-based Second Cup chain.

Liberties is "three businesses under one roof," he said, including the largest, independent book store in the United States, a music store and a coffee-and-desserts-only cafe with live entertainment.

A regular visitor to Liberties beginning in late 1992, Bregman decided that he liked the atmosphere so much he wanted to hang his hat there and in mid-1994 he bought the business.

Liberties is like a traditional bookstore, with a warm environment that encourages one to linger. It is staffed with "intelligent people who love books and love being around people," he said.

Liberties has 100 employees and Bregman reported that his is "one of the top grossing bookstores" in the United States.

The bookstore's shelves are packed with more than 90,000 titles on all subjects and Liberties features a large children's section, as well as an international magazine and newspaper reading room.

Business Profile

TD's first female senior vice-president:

Getter charts a unique career path

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Ruth Getter was an up-and-coming economist in Boston, a friend used to chide her for not playing by the conventional rules for success.

"You go to lunch with your secretary. You don't like social gatherings. You don't have power lunches. You just sort of do what you think is right."

But doing the best she could at whatever she did has paid off for Getter, now 52. In February, she became the Toronto Dominion Bank's first female senior vice-president and chief economist. In fact, she is the first woman chief economist at any Canadian bank.

Getter runs the bank's 17-person economic research department. Its mandate is to gather and distribute economic information, brief executives and inform clients on economic events, and provide economic predictions.

Getter joined Toronto Dominion in 1987 as senior economist in the department she now runs. In 1992, she was appointed director of the department, and was promoted to vice-president in 1993.

Although it's still rare for women to reach the upper echelons of the banking world, women now make up about 75 per cent of the staff at Canadian banks, said Getter.

"I think it's a reflection of changing realities," she said, in her comfortable Toronto Dominion Bank Tower office. "Women are making up a larger and larger proportion of the market. More women than men are starting their own businesses. There are a lot of women customers and potential customers. Women are more powerful in terms of financial clout. Just from a business perspective, it makes sense."

Such a pragmatic explanation devoid of jargon is typical of Getter. "The reason people like to listen to me is, I speak English. Economists tend to talk on a level that's extremely boring, and in jargon."

Much of Getter's work these days involves travelling across North America and abroad to speak to bank clients and business groups about the Canadian economy.

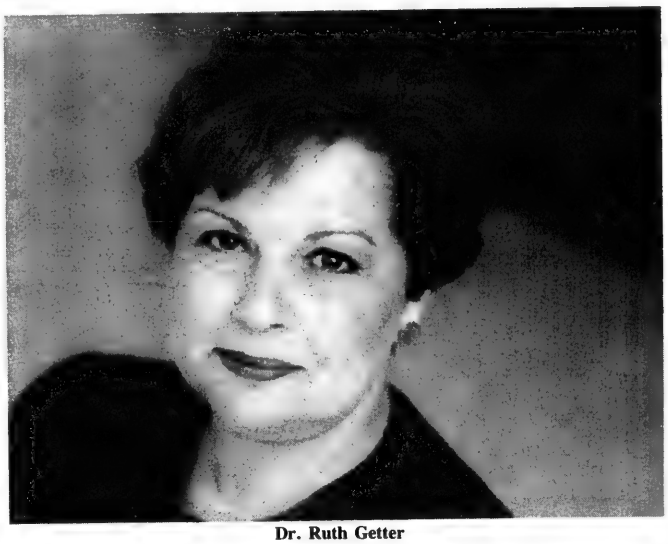
"I think Canada is still going through a very difficult time, but this is a very rich country. This is not a country going down the tubes."

The relatively low value of the Canadian dollar (about 74 cents US at press time) is good from an economic perspective, she said. Increased tourism is one example.

Getter's prediction that the dollar would strengthen has already begun to be confirmed. (At press time, the Canadian dollar was worth 75 cents US.)

Recent spikes in interest rates notwithstanding, Getter believes there's an overall downward trend until the end of the year.

Although she doesn't believe that Canada is in the midst of a recession, she is quick to add that the economy is "not booming. Unfortunately what we're not seeing is growth in jobs."



Dr. Ruth Getter

People who have been laid off here have had to learn to do different things, such as becoming entrepreneurs and consultants, she pointed out.

The resulting increase in new small businesses — an increase, it is commonly believed, that will create most of the new jobs — has led to an increased demand for specialized banking services, such as small business loans.

Canadian banks have fallen under heavy criticism in recent months for not meeting the needs of small business.

"Small business isn't really my area," said Getter, hedging. "The banks understand the problem. They're trying to do what they can. Maybe they're not doing enough, but at the same time it's a wonderful political baseball bat. The truth is, we're not as bad as we're painted, but we're not as good as we should be. We are trying to do something about it."

Getter remains optimistic about Ontario's future following the election of Mike Harris as premier in June.

"I'm not saying the new government is better or worse, but from the point of view of economics, I have a feeling it will focus much more on helping business to expand and bringing new business in. If we allow business to grow here, we have more jobs.

"Ontario has been perceived as anti-business. That tends to discourage investment. It tends to discourage companies from locating in Ontario and it encourages business to leave."

While the new government's spending cutbacks have been tough, Getter believes there was little alternative.

"I don't think you can have the kind of deficit we've seen indefinitely. It has nothing to do with your political belief. It has to do with business decisions. If you're in Ontario and you have to compete with someone in Michigan, New York or Ohio and your taxes are twice as high, you're not going to be able to compete."

On the other hand, Getter acknowledged, if she were an out-of-work Ontarian, she'd be a very unhappy person.

There is no question that opportunities appear better in the United States, Getter said, but she is convinced the quality of life here is far superior.

"It may sound trite, but money isn't everything. Maybe you could make more money or pay less taxes in the States, but there's a huge price to be paid. Toronto people treat each other in a much more civilized manner, from the smallest thing like standing patiently in line behind a bank machine."

Getter spent most of her adult life in the United States and believes her decision to return to Canada in 1987 was one of the best she's made.

Born in what was then Palestine, Getter moved to Montreal in 1952. She holds Israeli, Canadian and American citizenship.

While in school, she worked for her father, who owned a typewriter parts factory. A straight-A student, Getter initially turned down a scholarship to McGill University because she couldn't afford to buy textbooks.

Once she discovered she could obtain more funding, she entered McGill, where she earned her BSc in genetics.

Her scientific studies were derailed after her marriage in the early 1960s, when she accompanied her husband to Athens, Ohio. Because there was no genetics department at Ohio University, she decided to enrol in an undergraduate economics course.

"I was going to study no matter what," recalled Getter. She found the course "really fascinating" and after one semester proceeded to work on her master's degree.

Following a divorce when her children were 8 and 13, she completed her PhD at Boston University. While working on her thesis, she took a full-time job as an economist with a Boston consulting firm, specializing in detailed analyses of industrial and regional trends in the U.S. economy.

Unlike some successful women, Getter had no mentor as a graduate student or on her way up the career ladder.

"But I was fortunate that there were always people who were very supportive, and most of them were men. It didn't matter that I was a woman or that I walked into class pregnant. They understood I could only go to school part time, and that I didn't have money. They would find financial help for me — and all I had to do was get straight As."

Throughout university and after, Getter had no career path, she admits now. "I didn't even know what it meant."

Dear Ella,
I have been best friends with Mark and Karen for many years, even when Mark and Karen decided to get married we remained inseparable friends. I treasured this friendship more than anything else on earth, even though I secretly had a crush on Karen. Until recently this crush on Karen was just a dream, that is until Mark and Karen split up. I remained friends with both Karen and Mark separately, but the three Musketeers are no longer together.
Karen and I have started dating. Mark is aware that I am seeing Karen but believes it to be the platonic relationship that has existed in the past. Mark has also confided in me that he still loves Karen, and would like me to preach his case to her. I have mentioned this to Karen and she has stated a lack of interest in getting back with Mark. I am afraid to tell Mark about Karen and I, as this may affect our relationship, as well as I am feeling guilty as if I had stolen Karen away from Mark. I also miss the days of the three Musketeers, but I do not want to give up Karen to get back to those days.
What to do?
Confused

Dear Confused,
A good friend is a rare and precious commodity not to be traded lightly. That is certainly what you will be doing by starting a romantic relationship with Karen. Your letter leads me to believe that the friendship you have developed over the years with Mark and Karen is important to you. Don't lose it. I realize that you care for Karen and your relationship probably took a natural path, but what happens if it doesn't work out with Karen? It is not easy to go back. When the emotions of close friends are involved follow your head, not your heart. You and Karen can remain dear friends as will you and Mark. Your guilty feelings are not without merit. Go for the "sleeping better at night" decision. The rewards of having a close friend are extraordinary. Don't lose a significant person, and possibly persons in your life.

Dear Ella,
My daughter is getting married in October. She is marrying a wonderful man, however his parents are so dominating that their interference in the wedding plans is causing my daughter much grief. She cries every time I speak to her. I've asked her to talk to her fiancee about the problem and have him speak to his parents but he thinks the whole thing will blow over and not to take it so seriously. He says "it's only a wedding". It hurts me as a parent to see my only daughter so upset at a time that should be exciting and memorable. Any suggestions?
Wedding Wars

Dear Wedding Wars,
Your daughter must take a stand. She should be firm but nice. This is her wedding day and it should be something very special for her to remember, not a nightmare that she would want to forget. Her fiancee should wake up and see how upset his bride to be is. He should help when breaking the news to his parents that they are not the planners and organizers of the wedding. She has to assert herself now. Don't forget, she's in it for the long haul and the ways she handles this may set the tone for years to come!

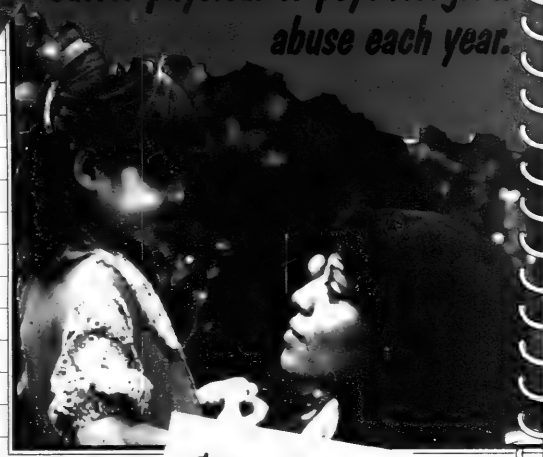
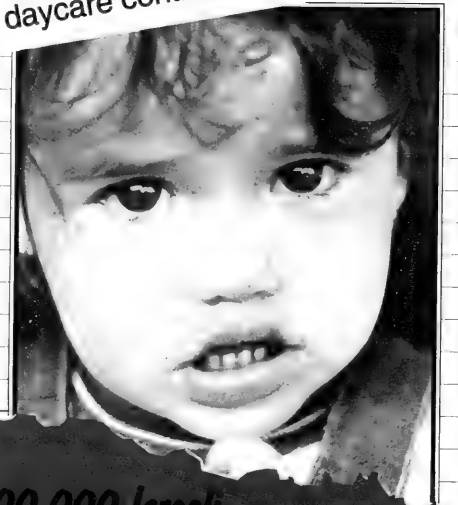
80,000 Israeli pre-school children suffer physical or psychological abuse each year.



$600 a year will provide a child with a loving home and psychological rehabilitation in a Na'amat full care residence.

$400 a year will give a deprived child a nourishing diet and a pre-school head-start in a Na'amat daycare centre.



200,000 Israeli children live below the poverty line.

Each year thousands of Israeli teenagers drop out of school before grade nine...

...because of early environment deprivation or below-average skills. Too many become involved with drugs, crime or prostitution.

Ottawa absent at Jerusalem's party

By LEORA FRUCHT and RICHARD CLEROUX

JERUSALEM — The Canadian government is undecided about whether to participate in the Jerusalem 3000 celebration and did not send any embassy representative to last week's gala opening.

Following a briefing with Israeli Foreign Ministry officials, ambassador-designate David Berger said Canada would weigh the issue and come to a decision soon.

The 15-month-long festival opened Sept. 4. It marks 3,000 years since King David made Jerusalem his capital and will feature major cultural events.

But some countries, notably those of the European Union, are boycotting the celebrations, which they regard as an attempt by Israel to stake its claim on Jerusalem prior to next year's scheduled talks on the permanent status of the city.

During the briefing with Berger, Foreign Ministry officials stressed the cultural-historical significance of the festival and urged Canada not to "automatically adopt the same stand as the European Union," according to a ministry official.

The current state of diplomatic limbo at the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv provided officials there with a convenient excuse for avoiding the opening. Ambassador Norman Spector departed last month, while Berger is to be accredited only this week.

Canadian Embassy consul David Viveash said no representative attended the festivities because the invitation was issued in Spector's name and could not be used by anyone else at the embassy – a claim Israel Foreign Ministry officials dismissed as "ridiculous."

Showers of light launch Jerusalem 3000 celebrations. [RNS]

When pressed, however, Viveash said that Ottawa has not decided on its policy regarding participation in the celebrations. Canada is due to stage a major week-long tribute to Jerusalem next June, but the government is not certain whether it will participate in this event, confirmed Viveash. "Ottawa is looking into the question," he said.

The tribute is being organized by the Canadian Committee for Jerusalem 3000, headed by Neri Bloomfield of Montreal.

The absence of U.S. Ambassador to Israel Martin Indyk at last week's opening celebrations triggered an angry rebuke by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. (Indyk and Secretary of State Warren Christopher subsequently denied that the United States was boycotting the festival and assured Israel that the ambassador would attend other events.)

Only 17 out of 70 ambassadors invited to the opening showed up, according to a Foreign Ministry official. But many embassies sent cultural attaches. Canada sent no one.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert's office was unaware of Canadian ambivalence regarding the festival. "We fully expect Canada to hold its scheduled tribute to Jerusalem," said a spokesperson.

Cooperation a first at UN Conference

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BEIJING — For the first time in the history of United Nations women's conferences, tension between Muslims and Jews, Palestinians and Israelis, has not overshadowed the rest of the gathering at the Fourth World Conference on Women being held here.

In fact, there has been more cooperation and dialogue between Jews and Palestinians than Jewish delegates expected, some American delegates said.

The UN conference began Sept. 4 and is scheduled to end Sept. 15, while a larger gathering of representatives from nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), ran from August 30 to Sept. 8.

While the Chinese government has been harassing and monitoring delegates, Jewish attendees said they were left alone.

The first time Jewish delegates gathered in their own caucus, on the opening day of the NGO forum, two Palestinian women, both Israeli citizens, joined the 80 Jewish women. "That never would have happened in the past. People were excited they were there because it was the first indication that it was going to be a different kind of conference," said Jessica Lieberman of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, and an organizer of the caucus.

"Jews and Palestinians are talking to each other about working together in Israel on Jerusalem Link," a group that deals with issues surrounding the peace process, said Lieberman

The CJN attempted to contact the leader of Canada's delegation, Secretary of State for the Status of Women Sheila Finestone, but was told she was not available for a telephone interview until this week. And a spokesperson for the minister, Louise Poulin, told The CJN that Finestone "is not comfortable" speaking about Arab-Israeli or Jewish-Palestinian issues arising from the conference.

Reva Price, a lobbyist for B'nai Brith International, said she had "really good conversations with women from all over the Arab world while wearing my Jewish Women's Caucus button and Jewish star necklace.

Israeli citizenship denied Pollard

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — Israel has denied a citizenship request by Jonathan Pollard, who was convicted nine years ago of passing classified U.S. data to Israel, the Israeli news agency Itim reported last Sunday.

The agency said Interior Minister Ehud Barak had written to Pollard's lawyer saying he had studied the request and concluded that a law allowing him to grant citizenship to residents of another country was not applicable in this case.

Pollard's Toronto-based wife Esther, had sought Israeli citizenship for her husband in the hope of improving his chances for parole this fall – a move that deeply split Pollard's family.

"The circumstances of this matter do not conform with the use the minister of interior traditionally makes of his authority," said Barak in his letter.

CANADA

Warrant Issued

VANCOUVER — A warrant has been issued for the arrest of white supremacist Charles Scott for failing to show up at a Chilliwack court on charges of trespassing onto a Canadian Armed Forces base.

Scott and another man were arrested at the base last February, after they refused to leave a parking lot where they were handing out pamphlets.

Scott, who has ties to the Idaho-based Church of Aryan Nations, also faces a charge of mischief, following a scuffle in Kelowna a few weeks ago. Scott is said to be in Ontario, looking for work.

Young Leadership Awards

WINNIPEG — The Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) has announced that Judi Shuster and Dr. Ian Goldstine have been named the community's Young Leadership Award winners for 1995.

Dalhousie Classes

HALIFAX — Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein, spiritual leader of Beth Israel Synagogue here and the Jewish chaplain at Dalhousie University, will be teaching three classes in Hebrew reading, Jewish Bible study and questions and answers on Judaism. Classes begin this week.

Rabbi Grafstein says all are welcome to attend, regardless of background.

ISRAEL

Touring Hebron

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres toured Hebron last Monday to get a close look at the security situation, prior to reaching an agreement with the Palestinians on Israeli troop redeployment in the city.

Noam Arnon, the leader of the Jewish settlement in the city, said the settlers did not know about the two-hour visit in advance.

Arnon added that the settlers were not asked to meet with the delegation.

Population Rises

JERUSALEM — The Jewish population in the territories has increased by 5,000 people in the first six months of 1995, representing an increase of nearly four per cent, Israeli media reported last week.

The number of Jews living in Judea, Samaria and Gaza is now 133,000, reports said.

Officer Shot Dead

JERUSALEM — An Israeli army reserve officer was shot dead last week by Palestinian police after driving through a roadblock in the Gaza Strip.

Lt.-Col. Emmanuel Maloul, 48, sped through a Palestinian roadblock after crashing through three others, one of them set up by the Israel Defence Force.

Israeli and Palestinian police officials, as well as Maloul's widow, said they believed Maloul wanted to commit suicide.

Givat Haviva Honored

JERUSALEM — The Givat Haviva Institute, which works to advance rapprochement between Arabs and Jews, last month received the Speaker of the Knesset's Quality of Life Award.

Givat Haviva, founded in 1949 as the educational seminary of the Kibbutz Artzi Federation, was honored for its "far-reaching and excellent work in the field of encouraging and furthering tolerance, respect, understanding and good neighborly relations — in education and in practice."

PA Accepts Iraqis

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority (PA) has agreed to absorb Iraqi refugees who have been held in Israeli jails since fleeing Baghdad.

More than 50 Iraqis are currently in Israeli jails, awaiting a country to grant them political asylum. But no country has made an offer.

The PA agreed to take 40 of the Iraqis. Of those, 14 agreed to accept the proposition.

Aid for Bosnians

JERUSALEM — Israel, Jordan and Turkey are considering a coordinated effort to aid Bosnian Muslims.

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid held meetings on the matter in Jordan last Wednesday with Jordanian and Turkish representatives.

Earlier this year, Israel and Jordan coordinated an aid airlift for Bosnian Muslims.

Cash or Charge?

JERUSALEM — Rabbinical court officials say they may allow fees to be paid by credit card so that divorce documents can be granted more quickly.

A special computer program is already in use in 10 batei din throughout the country aimed at cutting down waiting time to receive a get.

Rabbinical court officials have also undergone a four-day course aimed at improving services and cutting bureaucracy.

WORLD

Calls for Probes

GAZA CITY — A top Palestinian official has asked Israel to investigate what he called a massacre of over 400 Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip by Israeli forces during the 1956 Sinai war.

As well, Israeli deputy foreign minister Eli Dayan met with Egyptian foreign minister Amr Moussa in Cairo last week to discuss Egypt's request for an investigation into Israel's alleged killing of Egyptian Prisoners of War in the 1956 and 1967 wars.

Peres Visits

ALMATY, Kazakhstan — Israel Foreign Minister Shimon Peres paid a two-day visit to the Central Asian Republic of Kazakhstan late last month, in an effort to strengthen relations between the two countries.

Peres and his Kazakh counterpart, Kasymzhomart Tokayev, signed bilateral agreements on trade, culture and technology.

Lauck Extradited

COPENHAGEN — Danish officials have extradited American neo-Nazi Gary Lauck to Germany to face charges relating to racist activity.

Lauck, 41, who was arrested near Copenhagen on March 20 at the request of German authorities, faces five years in jail in Germany if convicted on the charges, which include racial incitement and the distribution of illegal propaganda and Nazi symbols.

Why Benjamin's?

Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.

For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with licensed funeral directors who are Jewish. There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.

They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.

Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

UJA campaign launched amid much fanfare

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With song, dance and a shmaltzy letter home to a bubbie, the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) officially kicked off its 1996 fundraising campaign last week.

About 1,000 canvassers, contributors and guests crowded into the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts for the sold out inaugural event.

They were treated to an evening of contemporary Israeli folk and pop music by the Dor L'Dor Singers, Israeli dance by the Jerusalem Dancers and video from Israel depicting the visit of 16-year-old Hamiltonian Laura Levin. Levin provided the voice-over for the video in the form of a letter back to her grandmother, describing her experiences in the Jewish state.

Coupled with messages from UJA volunteers, it all made for an uplifting pep rally to motivate those present to gear up for the annual campaign.

The event also marked the launch of the UJA's new strategy of asking contributors to pledge funds for three consecutive years.

That will enable Jewish service providers, which are funded primarily through the UJA campaign, to engage in long-term planning, said Carol Kassel, co-chair of the 1996 campaign.

"Imagine beginning next year's campaign with millions of dollars already committed," states a message from Kassel and campaign co-chair Charles Gold. "This will free up time to reach out to new donors; and the community will be able to better plan, knowing its financial position for the next three years."

Instead of having to canvas known contributors each year, canvassers will be free to look to new donors and broaden the UJA's contributor base, Kassel said.

As of the launch date, more than $27 million had been raised for the next three years, exceeding all expectations, she said.

The need for additional funds is increasing with new demands on the community, Kassel said. Toronto's Jewish population has skyrocketed from 97,000 to 160,000 in just 20 years, as Jews from around the world flock to the city. An estimated 43,000 Jews live north of Steeles Avenue and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, which operates the UJA campaign, must address their needs, she said.

Funds to Israel expected to drop

The Jewish population is aging and one-seventh of all Jews — 20,000, including 3,500 children — live below the poverty line, she said.

With intermarriage running at 20 per cent, funds are needed for continuity programs as well.

Jews also have international obligations, such as the settlement in Israel of Jews from the former Soviet Union, she added.

While much of the evening's program focused on Levin's Israel experience and the absorption of Jews there, funds allocated to the Jewish Agency from the Toronto campaign are expected to drop in the 1995-96 fiscal year.

The drop is expected to be 1.4 per cent, or $166,000, said Federation spokesperson Howard English. "The reason for the decrease to Israel is to ensure that nothing is cut from education and continuity programs" in Toronto, he said.

In addition, the UJA can expect growing domestic pressures in coming years. Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) executive director Gordon Wolfe has said that in the wake of Ontario government cutbacks, the Jewish community may have to come up with $1 million to ensure that those on welfare retain the same standard of living they experience now.

English said "the biggest impact of the [Ontario] budget cuts on the UJA campaign will be seen in 1997 and 1998. That's when the full impact will hit home."

In the meantime, discussions are being held to study the impact of the cuts on the Federation's supplementary financial assistance to JF&CS, he said.

Another factor that may affect community fundraising in the future is the $14 million bailout of the Jewish Community Centre. Raising money to replenish the money spent to rescue the centre will be part of a community capital campaign separate from the UJA campaign," English said. Its details have yet to be determined though it appears it will be merged with other community capital campaigns, he added.

In the meantime, interest payments on the funds borrowed to bail out the centre will be paid by the federation, he said.

In addition to Kassel and Gold, the campaign launch was addressed by Julia Koschitzky, chair of the world board of trustees of Keren Hayesod; by Sandra Brown, the new president of the federation; and Vicki Campbell and Norman Godfrey, co-chairs of the community launch.

Israel's Dor L'Dor singers helped entertain a capacity crowd of 1,000 at the kickoff of the UJA's 1996 fundraising campaign.

Wheel-Trans cutbacks hit the disabled hard

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hundreds of partially disabled members of the Jewish community are being cut off Wheel-Trans service beginning Sept. 24.

"We are very concerned and 600 people here have signed a petition asking the service to be restored," said Sheila Zane, coordinator of social action at the Bernard Betel Centre.

From 50 to 100 members are immediately affected, she said. They depend on Wheel-Trans not only to come to the centre, but to get to doctors. They are people who use walkers or scooters to get around, but who cannot use public transit.

Zane said the centre encouraged the petition signers to attend a protest rally Sept. 9 at Bay and Gerrard streets.

The Toronto Transit Commission (TTC), responding to a $2 million reduction in its grant from the Ontario government for Wheel-Trans, has eliminated ambulatory people from the service.

Among those affected are eight people with arthritis who use Wheel-Trans to get to a program of pool exercises at Baycrest Centre.

One of them is Ethel Stercz, 65. "I'm lost without Wheel-Trans," she said. "I've been going to the pool for four years, ever since I got an artificial knee. When I first went there I was so bad I had to be lowered into the pool in a wheelchair, I was like a statue. What will I do now? I can't walk to the bus and I can't afford a taxi. And I have to have an operation on my other knee. I've never used Wheel-Trans for shopping or to get to a hairdresser."

The TTC will continue its Wheel-Trans service for non-ambulatory people and their escorts and for ambulatory persons who need kidney dialysis. People using Wheel-Trans pay a regular TTC fare.

The Ontario government cut means that Wheel-Trans has to remove about 15,000 ambulatory people from its registered roll of 25,000 users, Ellen Kogan, a TTC official, told The CJN.

"The ambulatory users will be able to call in after 12 noon, but I don't think there is much chance they will be served," Kogan said. She sees no hope that the situation will improve in 1996.

Twenty-five people who use the pool arthritis program at Baycrest have petitioned against the cut to eight of their number who depend on Wheel-Trans. The others are either driven there or live close by.

The TTC had to cut use of a fleet of taxis which serve ambulatory people to meet the budget reduction, said Marilyn Bolton, TTC director of public affairs.

The TTC was not told until July 21 about the cuts, and had to implement the entire $2 million cut in the period between Sept. 24 and the end of the year, she said.

A press release from the Baycrest pool users who are cut off said they do not drive, cannot climb the high steps of regular buses, or navigate the often slippery subway stairs. They feel they have been abandoned, the release said.

About 80 members of the North York Aphasia Centre will lose their Wheel-Trans privileges, an official of the centre said. (Aphasia is a language disorder that occurs after a stroke, affecting the left side of the brain.)

Many of the centre's members can't speak while others have varying degrees of verbal skills. About 50 per cent are in wheel chairs. The remainder need some form of help to get around.

Deportation hearing set for alleged war criminal

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An alleged Latvian war criminal who tried to enter Canada last week was intercepted by immigration authorities and spent the weekend in jail, pending a deportation hearing.

Konrad Kalejs, 81, an Australian citizen, was detained at Pearson Airport as he tried to enter Canada. Last June, Kalejs entered Canada and was facing a July deportation hearing when he left the country voluntarily.

He was held in custody this time, because immigration authorities were not convinced he would appear at the hearing, said Kevin Sack, a spokesperson for Immigration Canada. The hearing is scheduled for sometime this week.

Immigration Canada will argue that "there is a reasonable basis to believe Kalejs committed a war crime or crime against humanity" and is therefore inadmissible to Canada, Sack said.

Latvian Nazi unit

In 1993, U.S. authorities deported Kalejs after determining that he had been a high-ranking member of the Arajs Kommando, a Latvian Nazi unit that executed thousands of Jews and others.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Irving Abella commended immigration officials for acting quickly to detain Kalejs.

"Our community is very pleased the government decided to detain him, but I wish they'd taken our advice [in June] and detained him and deported him. Then we would not be concerned or irritated by his to-ing and fro-ing," Abella said.

Abella said he suspected Kalejs was merely trying to use Canada as a springboard to re-enter the United States.

Koffler property gift to U of T largest ever

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An 860-acre estate with a past guest roster that includes former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, former Israeli president Ephraim Katzir and Prince Philip has been donated to the University of Toronto Foundation by Murray and Marvelle Koffler and their family.

Joker's Hill, valued at $16 million, is the largest gift the university has ever received and one of the largest ever given to any Canadian university.

The estate, at which a number of major equestrian events have been held, will be used as an outdoor education centre for research and field investigations. A part of the Oak Ridges Moraine, it is located north of Toronto in the northeast part of the Township of King, west of Newmarket.

Almost half of Joker's Hill is designated as environmentally protected land. The estate includes several houses, stables for 60 horses, a heavily wooded forest, valley streams and meadows. There is a sugar bush and farming land for maple syrup production.

"This is an unparalleled gift," said U of T president Robert Prichard in a news release issued by the university. "The philanthropy of the Koffler family is well known and we are deeply honored that they have chosen to give this property for the benefit of the University of Toronto."

Ever since the Kofflers bought the property in 1969, they "always felt" they would eventually donate it, Koffler told The CJN. "It became evident that the University of Toronto could handle it in the best way possible.

"U of T students studying in a variety of fields from ecology to forestry will benefit tremendously from using this property as an outdoor education centre. At the same time, the integrity of much of the land will be preserved for the future," he said in the news release.

Koffler will manage the property for the university, he said.

A graduate of the U of T's faculty of pharmacy, Koffler is founder and honorary chair of Shopper's Drug Mart.

He has a long association with the university as an alumnus, former governor, co-chair of the 1976-81 Update fundraising campaign, recipient of an honorary doctor of laws degree. He also underwrote the university's Koffler Student Services Centre and the Koffler Institute of Pharmacy Management.

Koffler's varied interests have led him to found the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, the Canadian Council for Native Business, Operation Lifeline (a volunteer organization to settle boat people from Southeast Asia), the Koffler Centre for the Arts, the Foundation for Ecological Action in Israel, the Council on Drug Abuse and the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition.

Mitzvah Partnership provides new way to do good deeds

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Mitzvah Partnership has an unusual focus, says volunteer Nancy Wolfe.

The idea is to step outside the traditional notion of donating cash. The concept evolved from a fund established in 1985 by Norman Auslander in memory of his wife, Ruth. The Ruth Wattenberg-Auslander Emergency Fund (RWAEF) was set up under the auspices of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS).

The Mitzvah Partnership is "an innovative way to do good deeds. Whatever we raise goes to individuals, not to agencies," Wolfe says. Professional service businesses contribute to the community by means other than cash donations.

Norman Ringel, a Toronto-based management consultant and businessman, came up with the idea. He and Auslander oversee the projects, which now include some 35 people who contribute time and services.

Each venture within the program is autonomous. An individual or organization brings a proposal and if it is accepted, they proceed on their own but maintain contact with Auslander and Ringel. Seed money for new, approved ventures is available through RWAEF.

Among the programs now operating are:

- The Computer Venture, initiated by Peter Feldman, a management consultant. He enabled the Mitzvah Partnership to receive several computers targeted for special education and job retraining. Three computers have been donated to Jewish Vocational Services and two to the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre. The Computer Venture could inject up to $50,000 worth of computer equipment into community services, according to Feldman.
- the Good Night Sleep Venture, which seeks donations of mattresses, blankets and pillows for people in need, often those in a crisis situation.
- and the Canadian Tire Money-Raising Venture, headed by Wolfe, a sales and marketing consultant, and Joel Simms, a business consultant. Volunteers go to Canadian Tire stores and collect the store's "money," which is then used for gift certificates. Some Canadian Tire stores have agreed to offer a discount to JF&CS clients who have the gift certificates.

Wolfe says that plans call for schools to be linked to the program.

The group plans to initiate new ventures and develop a core of professionals who will contribute their time and expertise, she says.

Camp Shalom Director for its 48th season.

Yacov was born and educated in Haifa. Following his Israeli Army service, he came to North America as a Shaliach and served on staff for some years at various summer camps, including Camps Shalom and Ramah, as Music Specialist, Waterski Instructor, Program Director and Head of Waterfront.

At the same time he led Diaspora teenagers who competed in the annual International Bible Contest in Israel.

Married, with one child, Yacov is already known to many Shalomnicks. He will carry on the Camp Shalom philosophy established and maintained by the Toronto Zionist Council since 1948, which mandates Shalom as a non-profit, non-political, general Zionist camp associated with young Judaea. (Despite any rumours to the contrary, Camp Shalom is NOT affiliated with any particular religious denomination).

Applications for camper registration will be available following the High Holidays. Your enquiries are welcome. Call Malka at the Camp Shalom office, 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 207, Toronto, Ont. M6B 3K1, phone (416) 783-6744 fax (416) 783-9363

Eitz Chaim has new principal

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Noted educator Rabbi Aaron Levine has had a six-year respite from senior administrative responsibility.

Now that rest is over, he is "charged up, positive and enthusiastic" about his new position as principal of the boys' Patricia campus of Eitz Chaim Schools and of the Spring Farm Pre-school, looking after the educational needs of some 600 students.

Eventually, Rabbi Levine told The CJN, he'll be dean of all three Eitz Chaim campuses, Patricia, Spring Farm and Viewmount.

He succeeds Rabbi Shneur Weinberg.

The 53-year-old rabbi's credentials are impressive.

Besides receiving smichah (rabbinic ordination) from Rabbi Jacob Ruderman of Ner Israel in Baltimore, Rabbi Levine, 53, took advanced teacher's and rabbinic training at Ner Israel, earned his master's of education degree at Loyola College, a Doctor of Talmudic Law degree at Ner Israel and a Doctor of Philosophy in Judaica at Maimonides College in Toronto. He has been principal at schools in Easton, Md., Savannah, Ga., Asbury Park, N.J., and Ner Israel Yeshivah in Toronto.

After taking two years off to write, he prepared for his new position by serving for four years as assistant principal.

He has written extensively on education topics, and his books on Halachah and customs of sickness, death and mourning are considered among the modern classics in their field. For several years, he wrote a column for The CJN.

Rabbi Aaron Levine

In 1979, he received the Educators Award from Torah Umesorah, the National Society for Hebrew Day Schools.

Eitz Chaim, he said, is unique in offering a "100 per cent Torah hashkafa (outlook)," while at the same time providing "an excellent secular education."

The school tries to instil, he says, a love for learning, for the land of Israel, and for klal Israel.

Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum, one of the founding and a longtime principal, and Rabbi Weinberg created a curriculum that is "respected all over North America" as well as gathering together an excellent staff, Rabbi Levine said.

Among his own plans for the school are increasing computerization, parent education for both mothers and fathers and a formal program to instill derech eretz, (respect and good characteristics).

Special education is a concern. "Ten per cent of any school population has special needs," he noted. While the school offers part-time remedial and enrichment services, "we would love to have a P'tach [a program for the learning disabled that is offered right in the regular schools]. We might have to develop a special education class here if community institutions are not sensitive enough to Orthodox practice."

The board and the Mothers' Association have been very cooperative, he said, both in supporting his ideas, and financially, this last for which he is particularly grateful because of community budget cuts.

Radio talk show targets frum listeners

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, a Toronto radio show will focus on entertaining the frum community, but host and producer Phil Kravetsky expects it to be so good, that everyone will enjoy it.

Starting this week, listeners can tune in The Radio Show, with Phil Kravetsky Monday to Friday on CJMR (AM 1320) from 7.30 to 8.30 a.m.

Phil Kravetsky

(The title, by the way, is temporary. Kravetsky plans to hold a public contest in a few weeks, to choose a more catchy name.)

Kravetsky, 29, has spent several years in what he calls his "day job" in the trucking industry and more recently, in a mergers and acquisition firm.

But his real love has been music production. He has managed rock bands and currently manages country music artist Phil Halliday.

Most recently, he's been a disc jockey at social events, and that's where inspiration struck.

"I had a call to do a bat mitzvah party," he says. "But they only wanted Hebrew music, what for want of a better word I call yeshivish music, like Mordechai Ben David, Shlomo Carlebach, Avraham Fried and the Miami Boys Choir."

Rather to his surprise, not just the kids but the adults at the party loved the show.

He realized there was a real interest in this kind of music but no outlet for it. So Kravetsky decided to provide one.

He went after sponsors, but with conditions. Food sponsors had to have proper rabbinic supervision and retail businesses could not advertise that they were open on Shabbat.

A community calendar will list events of the day.

"What would a decent [Jewish] radio show be without a d'var Torah?" Kravetsky queries. Every day will feature a different rabbi, including Mitch Mandell from Aish Hatorah, Mordechai Becher from Ohr Somayach, Menachem Mendel Bernstein from Chabad Lubavitch, Mordechai Smolarcik from NCSY and a rotating roster on Tuesdays that will include rabbis Irwin Witty, Baruch Taub, Mordechai Ochs and Mark Dratch.

Other features Kravetsky is considering are a weekly talk show and Bathurst Street traffic reports.

"We will represent all the aspects of what the community stands for," Kravetsky promises. "We want the advertisers and the community to be proud of what we are doing."

Aimed at children

It is with deep revulsion and disgust that we react to the harm aimed last week at the children of a Jewish elementary and middle school near Lyons in France. Fourteen people, mostly parents waiting to collect their children, were injured, one seriously, when a bomb exploded in a car parked 15 metres from the entrance to the school. Three of the injured were children.

The bomb exploded at 4:36 p.m, six minutes after classes were scheduled to be dismissed at the end of the school day, when more than 700 children would have been milling around, jostling each other or playing on the sidewalk of the street. But, inexplicably and somewhat mysteriously, the school bell failed to ring at the usual time. Instead it rang late, some moments after the explosion. The chief Rabbi of Lyons, whose children are students in the school, was moved to say that only a "large miracle" had prevented a tragedy of staggering proportions.

As of this writing, no one has claimed responsibility for the bombing. However, French authorities suspect Islamic fundamentalists from Algeria. Whoever they were, what could their motives possibly have been for such a vile and cowardly act? By trying to murder hundreds of children in France were they hoping to strike at the military government in Algeria? Or possibly at the immigration and social policies of the Chirac government? Perhaps they believed by targeting for death these hundreds of young children in France, they would help to bring down the peace process in the Middle East?

What cause calls upon them to try to kill hundreds of 5-year-olds, 10-year olds, 13-year-olds? What cause sees children as enemies to be cut down, shredded into exploded bits of flesh, slaughtered in a horrible instant of fire and painful death?

As we have written before, there is no logic to the vicious acts of the hater other than his hatred. But hatred aimed at hurting children is the hatred of cowards.

Transparent

The PQ government finally tabled the referendum question on which the people of Quebec will be voting, likely on Oct. 30. Premier Jacques Parizeau's public protestations to the contrary, the question is complex, convoluted and confusing. Deliberately so. It refers to an offer, a bill and an agreement. But it does not refer to separation from Canada, simple, clear and final, which is what the rest of Canada has repeatedly said a majority Yes vote would mean. The strategy is less cunning than it is transparent.

Campus news and views

In conjunction with Images, the newspaper serving Jewish students on college and university campuses in Toronto, The CJN inaugurates a new feature today under the banner Campus News and Views. Appearing monthly, The CJN will carry news and opinions written by students about students but not exclusively for students. As the editors of Images, Rinat Greenberg and Jessica Pelt, have explained, Campus News and Views is intended to extend the reach of Images across Canada to as many students and their families as possible. Wherever they are learning, students are invited to submit articles. In helping more students communicate better with each other, we hope in the process to improve our own ability to communicate with students as well.

Israeli soldier was doing his duty

Re: Dr. H. Kershen's encounter in Israel — Visiting a foreign country means also obeying and honoring the local laws and regulations, especially in security matters, after so many terrorist attacks in Israel.

The Israeli soldier at a checkpoint has the duty not to allow unauthorized vehicles to proceed to a closed area. By challenging these rules, Dr. Kershen endangered himself and his family.

Instead of obeying or asking the soldier to help him perform the U-turn, he ignored the order and proceeded to the closed area.

And again, instead of obeying the military security regulation, he "drove back to give the soldier a piece of his mind." Is this a case for discussion? Buying Israeli Bonds does not give the right to ignore military security regulations — on the contrary.

He should feel ashamed to besmear an Israeli soldier on duty, in security tense times.

Auto parts industry began with Jewish pedlars

Re: Leila Speisman's article Aug. 31 — In the early 1900s, the many Jewish immigrants who came to this country were either tailors, bakers or carpenters. Many had no trade at all and so became pedlars and sold household linens, carpets, pots and pans and other items. Many went out and collected scrap, whether it was metal, brass, tin or anything they could cash in, and this included parts of scrapped cars. Since there were quite a few cars around and the parts could be re-used, this develped into the replacement parts business.

In Toronto, the pioneers were the Swartz Brothers, Harry and Abe and their sons Moe, Abe, Jack and cousin Murray, and the Levy family, Mark, Ben, Syd, Heeney and Eddy. Other pioneers were Harry and Murray Glicksman, Charley and Syd Mandell, the Wolfe Brothers, Max Mandel, Sol Steiner and the rambunctious Abe Cohen. Also I must mention Nat Hurwich.

Hamilton had the Katz family, Sam, Nate and Moe and Henry; and Murray and Art Rosenblood, Sam Hoffman and Morris Kamy; the Waxman family, Jack, Joe, Husky; and the Levy brothers, Bob Fenwick, Ed Levy, the Rosenshines and a few others including the Kreiger family.

Brantford had Sammy Sherman, while in St. Catharines there were Sol and Kelly Granick. Kitchener had Al Rosenberg and Abe Fuss. In St. Catharines no one could forget the Goodman brothers, Percy and Morris.

Farther west, there were Louis Kirshenbaum, Sam Boom and Aaron Zeitchuk.

Going north there were the Goodman brothers in Newmarket, Harry and Isha; in North Bay, Marvin Hochman was the pioneer along with Herby Brown and son Marty. Further west in Sudbury, Charley Helpert and Art Cooper were pioneers, then later Norm Trachter, Irwin Kwart, and Dave Greenspoon. Sault Ste. Marie had Bert Seigal. Kirkland Lake had Al Brown and Sam Langer. Timmins gave Jack Helpert a good living and later on Morris Freedman. Ottawa saw Laz Mirsky build up a good business, as did Ab Segal and wife Betty in Kingston.

These were the pioneers who started selling used parts and eventually new parts. This grew into a multi-million dollar business.

All of this happened because a few Jewish pedlars picked up some scrap parts that could be re-used and an industry began.

There are limits to free speech

With reference to the article "Allan Borovoy Issues Free Speech Alarm" (May 18), Mr. Borovoy is still advocating freedom of speech, even though democracy in Europe was killed by freedom of speech. I am living proof of that.

About the prosecution of hatemongers, Borovoy insists there is no point in prosecuting "a bunch of nobodies."

It is very comforting to me to know that my whole family and a great number of my relatives were murdered by a "bunch of nobodies."

I am also very happy to hear that "people like Zundel" do not worry you, Mr. Borovoy. Where were you during the Holocaust?

You did say, it would bother you "if a person like Zundel were a teacher. Have you ever heard of Keegstra and Malcolm Ross?

Yes, I am in agreement with you when you recommend anti-discrimination programs in general. But I consider it a must to draw a line on freedom of speech. Even a street has a stop sign! And, oh yes, some people have learned something from the Holocaust.

'Our only problem is numbers'

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

The Atlantic Jewish community numbers about 3,000. That's not very many people spread across four provinces and several hundred thousand square kilometres.

There are small pockets of Jews — a handful in the Annapolis Valley of Nova Scotia, about 200 in Cape Breton, 60 in St. John's, Newfoundland and another 20 spread in remote areas of that island.

Halifax is the centre of Jewish life in the region, with 500 to 600 family units totalling about 1,700 people. Moncton, New Brunswick has 250 residents while Fredericton is home to 200. That's a far cry from the 1950s and 1960s when upwards of 5,000 Jews inhabited Atlantic Canada and the future looked bright.

Today, the future is anything but bright for most of the smaller communities. Halifax and Moncton are retaining their Jewish populations, and numbers might even be growing slightly. But in Saint John, N.B., where more than 300 Jewish people lived in the 1940s and 1950s, the numbers have dwindled to 40 and 45 families. The mean age, according to community patriarch Lou Michelson, is 65 or more "not the age when you have babies," he smiled.

Fredericton, N.B., once thriving with several hundred people, now numbers 65 families, most of them seniors. But while there are only seven children in the Hebrew school, a minyan convenes each Friday night and Saturday.

The story is the same throughout Atlantic Canada — small and dwindling, but those remaining try to be active. Yet that doesn't mean survival. There are eight active synagogues in the region, four with rabbis. Those communities without rabbis make do, but realize they miss the consistency of regular services and spiritual guidance.

The lessening of Jewish observance is a far cry from what occurred in the late 1800s and early part of the 20th century, when the communities grew with immigrants who were escaping the onrush of anti-Semitism in Europe and hoping for a safer, better, more prosperous life in Canada. Jewish life in Nova Scotia actually started in 1750, a year after Halifax was founded. By 1752, there were 30 Jews, many of whom were merchants, living in the town. Town officials very early allocated separate cemetery land for the Jews. The first synagogue (Orthodox) was dedicated in 1895 and a second synagogue (conservative) was developed in 1957.

Sydney's first Jews arrived in 1891 and by 1933, the Jewish population of the industrial area of Cape Breton was 900, surpassing Halifax's 785. Most came to the town because of the growing steel industry but few of the Russian Jewish immigrants worked in the mills, choosing to become peddlers and later retailers. Today, through emigration to larger Jewish communities in Quebec and Ontario, Cape Breton struggles, with two synagogues, no rabbis and an aging population numbering 200.

Saint John's Jewish community was founded in 1858 when Solomon Hart sailed from England. By chance, he landed in the New Brunswick port where he established a tobacco business and was joined a year later by family members. At the turn of the century, waves of European Jews arrived, most with trades skills and little money. Two synagogues existed for a short while but by 1919 amalgamated into one which still functions today, although without a rabbi for the past 13 years.

Moncton's existence started in the late 1890s as Lithuanians sought refuge from homeland persecution. By 1910, the community hired its first rabbi and soon built a synagogue. Today, the second largest Jewish community in the region is in a growing economic area but Rabbi David Ellis, in his third year as spiritual leader does not see great additions to his flock.

The first Jewish family arrived in Fredericton in 1912. A synagogue was built in 1914 and a cemetery purchased in 1943, just before Rabbi David Spiro became spiritual leader, a position he still holds 50 years later. Most Fredericton Jews were in the retail trade.

The first settler in St. John's was a fur trader and he was followed by merchants but what is termed the real history of Newfoundland Jewry started in 1909 when Israel Perlin built the first synagogue there. By 1935, there were 215 Jews reported in the Newfoundland census, a number that grew to 360 by 1971.

What has happened to a once thriving community? Where have all the Atlantic Canadian Jews gone?

"The youth are our future," said John Goldberg, Halifax-born executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, "but many leave to go to university and then stay away when they find a mate and a job. Because of assimilation, we lost them physically at 19 and lose them to religion at 25."

Jewish leaders don't think young Jews have to be lost. "We need good role models in the home," said Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein of Halifax's Beth Israel Synagogue, which celebrated its 100th anniversary in 1991. "Dedication to Judaism by the mother and father can be seen by the child. Without that dedication and learning, we just don't have continuity. Family togetherness on shabbat and holidays leads to a dedication of spirit. The kids will see it and gain through osmosis that they are Jewish and have traditions to carry on."

Rabbi Grafstein has visited the small Prince Edward Island Jewish community to lead discussions on Jewish identity. Rabbi Ellis has also helped the P.E.I. community of 30 families retain some identity. But Joe Naylor, a past executive member of AJC and a resident of North Wiltshire, P.E.I., said growth of his community will come from those who WANT to be involved. "Others will come if the active ones take the responsibility."

He said the biggest factor in Jewish observance on the island has been the presence of a core family that has been knowledgeable. There is no synagogue and no rabbi and it is impossible to find a regular minyan but holidays are celebrated in private homes.

He said it is a major challenge to keep children involved but community member Roscalie Simeone, now the AJC representative, runs a Hebrew school. "If a person wants their children involved, there are ways. Maybe the problem is the parents. They may not be caring or knowledgeable enough or maybe they don't understand our traditions."

The Newfoundland economy is as much the reason for the dwindling Jewish population as assimilation, said Claire Salarma who has raised her family in St. John's since 1988. "No one comes back once they leave to go to university," she said. "Once new people come here, they like the life, but it is impossible to attract new people."

She said the community will lose three of four families in 1995, two through retirement and two to seek other employment. "We have 15 active families, services Friday night and Saturday, and lots of events for children, traditionalists, feminists, you name the group. By keeping many activities going, we are preserving what we have as best we can.

There is a Hebrew school that meets two to three times a week. Some children go to Camp Kadimah, the regional summer camp near Halifax, which Rabbi Grafstein said, ensures many Jewish marriages.

"Our only problem is numbers," said the optimistic Salarma. "And the only thing that will improve that is an improvement in the economy."

Sydney and Glace Bay each have synagogues but neither has a rabbi. Sydney, where, according to former AJC president and chairman Martin Chernin, "the youngest Jewish man is in his late 30s or early 40s," lacks young professionals or people moving back to the community. Chernin grew up in Sydney but most of his friends left to go to university and never came back.

"We have a minyan every Sunday and, at 51, I'm the youngest one there," he said. "Jake David at 90, is the oldest and the rest are between 76 and 90." But, he adds, they have missed only one minyan this year. The congregants lead services and a rabbi is imported for the High Holidays.

"We don't have a lot, but what is here is a vibrant community," said Chernin.

Miriam Cohen was president of Hadassah in Fredericton but said only a dozen of the 44 members shows up for meetings. "And we don't have a synagogue sisterhood any more because we can't get people interested. Young people have gone back to work and don't have the time and our congregation is mostly senior anyway."

She said the younger parents aren't taking the initiative to lead because they're busy with other things. "I made time when my children were younger, even though I was teaching school, but no one is taking that initiative now."

Saint John's Michelson said there are more Jews in the cemetery than there are in the city. "It has been economics that have taken our young people away. They found better opportunities in other centres."

He admitted there is little in Saint John's limited Jewish cultural life to bring Jewish families to the New Brunswick city. There are Friday night and Saturday services at the conservative Sharrei Zedek synagogue and no problem getting minyans. But most attendees are retired. There are few activities except for the occasional AJC function, when 50 or 60 people come out, which Michelson said is 85 per cent of the community.

There are only three children in Hebrew school, taught by an Israeli who was brought to the city by the congregation in the 1960s and, as the community diminished, found employment with the provincial education department. He now teaches Hebrew school a couple of days a week. "But next year there are eight or nine children coming up who will be ready for Hebrew School and whose parents are involved in the synagogue," said Michelson, with a bit of hope in his voice.

"The communities having difficulty are those without rabbis," said the AJC's Goldberg. "Those with none are led by committed lay people but it is frustrating for those communities to see their members growing older, their synagogue (without a rabbi) gathering dust and the young people leaving."

He said more emphasis should be placed on visiting rabbis and scholars which "might give the members of the small communities something to hold onto. Torah has to be part of the people's lives and we have to bring those observances back to the community."

Goldberg said he is working with United Israel Appeal to establish religious continuity to those communities without rabbis. As well, the presence of arevot in Halifax and St. John's has helped bring some continuity to the region. "Moncton and Halifax have on-going youth programs," said Goldberg.

Rabbi Grafstein said, "I have seen an element (of young people) asking 'Do I want to grow (as a Jew)?' And they move away to do so."

LETTERS FROM JERUSALEM

Overcoming polarization

By Emil Fackenheim

My promised letter about Jewish Jerusalem must be postponed. As so often in Israel, an emergency has intervened. A suicide bus bomber has killed six in Ramat Gan, critically wounding two more and, more lightly, 29 others. One woman has survived two bus attacks in one year. Is she lucky or unlucky? She cannot decide.

This happened on July 23, but, although this letter will not appear until September, I am writing it now, just a few days after the bombing, while the experience is raw, and before the next crisis pushes it from the newspapers — and from our conscience. And, sure enough, on July 26 the Knesset had that media-event-vote on the Golan — whether, in the promised referendum, a 70 per cent majority is needed, instead of the ordinary 50 per cent, for sanctioning Israeli withdrawal. Could there be any clearer proof than that 59-59 cliff-hanger tie, of just how deeply, bitterly, the country is divided, over the momentous issues opened up by the Oslo accord?

One subject should allow no division: murder, once again, of Jews simply because they are Jews. The suicide-terrorists do not discriminate between Likudniks and Laborites, or Zionists and anti-Zionists, or even between Jews in Israel and Argentina.

When will this suicide-terrorism end? No honest person can say; so on this, there should be no dispute. Beyond dispute, too, ought to be that there is no ironclad way of stopping a terrorist so bent on martyrdom and his place in heaven as to kill himself, along with his victims.

But otherwise, reactions to the Ramat Gan massacre are as polarized as ever — and as predictable. (On my use of "massacre," some other time.) The government keeps on viewing the terrorists as "enemies of peace," and will not let them "kill the peace process." For its part, the opposition keeps viewing them as enemies, not of peace but of Israel, bent on weakening the state till it is ripe for the kill. (Thus the "Phased Plan," authorized by the PLO Council in 1974.)

And while Peace Now wants the peace process accelerated, its counterpart wants it slowed down or even — for those as extremely on the "right" as Peace Now is on the "left" — stopped. In this discouraging dispute only one voice is new and unpredicted. Fearing an irreparable "split" of Israel, and refusing to be a "rubber stamp president," Ezer Weizman has suggested that time be taken out by all parties involved, for reflection on where Israel should go from here. It is an inspiring rise above politics to statesmanship, fitting for a president.

But how encouraging is it when it is angrily attacked by Labor party Secretary General Nissim Zvilli and other coalition members? His "semi-political" statements, they charge, make Weizman president of "only part of the nation." Has the split in Israel become so catastrophic that its president cannot rise above party politics without being accused, for this very act, of playing party politics?

Confidence-building measures are obviously required, currently far less urgently between Israelis and Arabs than between Israelis themselves; and since the government has the power, the ball is in its court. What measures? Of the dozens available I will mention just five.

1. Yasser Arafat has condemned the Ramat Gan massacre, even in Arabic. For this he deserves credit but not much, for has he stopped praising "martyrs," of which suicidal ones are the purest? Has he announced that the age of Jew-killers shouting "Allah Akhbar" (God is great) is over, that henceforth they are sacrilegious murderers? For this, Israel has not even asked.

2. Israel has asked for amendment of the 1968 PLO charter, which calls for Israel's destruction. But what of the "phased" 1974 plan that this can be done in stages, recovering part of the land on the way to "liberating" the whole? One need not be a Likud type to suspect that this plan is still in force and being acted on by the PLO; but of this, in the entire Oslo-initiated peace process, with all the vast publicity it has engendered, the government has failed to make a public issue. Is it any wonder that otherwise unpolitical Israelis wonder whether they still have a government?

What if Israel started talking tough to Arafat — publicly, repeatedly — about murderous "martyrs"? What if it started talking tough to the world's diplomats, media-people, the PLO itself, about the phased plan? While failing to convert opponents, this would do much to reassure Israelis — the greengrocer, the car mechanic, the taxi driver, the Russian oleh and even convinced Likudniks — that the government is not negotiating weakly, aimlessly, but knows what it is doing and that in negotiating, it has some Zionist backbone.

LETTERS FROM JERUSALEM

The moral power of faith

By David Hartman

The great importance that Jews give to attending services on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is an interesting phemomenon. After all, the central religious motifs of these holidays are far removed from the issues and symbols which have captured the imagination of world Jewry in our times.

The yamim noraim, the days of awe, do not re-enact key moments in the history of the Jewish people as do the festivals of Passover, Shavuot and Sukkot. The concepts of historical memory and peoplehood are not essential for defining their significance. Given the importance of the Holocaust and rebirth of the State of Israel in shaping contemporary Jewish consciousness, one would expect that a holiday such as Passover would serve as a more meaningful metaphor for national solidarity for the vast majority of modern Jews.

The theological orientation of the High Holy Days stands in sharp contrast to that of the historical festivals. One cannot open up the prayer books of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur without reflecting on the notions of sin, guilt and accountability. The prayers graphically portray a sense of awe and trepidation before the divine Judge and a longing for spiritual renewal and tshuvah.

If Rosh Hsahanah and Yom Kippur are not to be trivialized into a national Jewish identity day, we as individuals, and our rabbis as synagogue leaders, must seek ways of retrieving some of the central theological metaphors which inform the liturgy of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. The awe and dread of God's judgement need to be reinterpreted if they are to speak to a modern Jewish sensibility.

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur awaken us to think about what it means to live in a universe where one proclaims that the ultimate ground of all being is a personal God? Biblical descriptions of sin and guilt are far more powerful notions than simply making a mistake or failing to realize one's human potential. The yearning for purity and atonement (taharah and kapparah) suggests that sinful behavior touches the very core of our being and creates a sense of estrangement from God. How we make sense of the biblical understanding of sin and guilt for modern Jews is crucial for retrieving, in a meaningful way, our covenantal relationship with God and the significance of a life of mitzvot.

The theme of proclaiming God's majesty and judgement on Rosh Hashanah implies that no human being or human institution — be it family, community or nation state — is above judgement. In a world infused with the spirit of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, accountability is the defining feature of the human.

The poetry and text of the liturgy bring human "creaturely" accountability into focus by reminding us of the frailty and vulnerability of human existence: "Who will live and who will die?" The themes of finitude and mortality, of contingency and accident, of the inexplicable and the tragic dimensions of life are not meant to instil terror and fear or to remind us of the multiple ways human beings can suffer death, but to heighten awareness of human finitude so as to increase the seriousness with which we relate to everyday life. The shocking language of the liturgy and the piercing sounds of the shofar are meant to waken us from our existential slumber. They were intended to create a sense of urgency. We do not possess more time and opportunity than what the present moment makes available. No one has a contract guaranteeing the future. The sage, Hillel, understood this sense of immediacy and urgency when he said "If I am not for myself, who will be for me?... If not now, when?"

We must find a way for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur to communicate a serious spirit of worship and humility; we must counteract the vulgarity of turning Kol Nidre and the Yom Kippur fast into yet another preoccupation with diet and self-control. When I was in the rabbinate I often had the strange feeling that for many of my congregants, Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur were wonderful days for successful UJA or Israeli Bond appeals. In my first pulpit there was excitement in welcoming Kol Nidre because it was the opportunity for the synagogue to conduct a successful appeal to meet its budget.

Our ability to breathe new life into the Rosh Hashanah-Yom Kippur holidays will depend on how the Jewish people will once again rehabilitate their God consciousness. The fundamental concepts of Judaism — mitzvah and kedusha, commandment and holiness — become hollow unless a person reflects seriously and intelligently on what God means for his or her spiritual life.

Coming to America

Sixty years ago (I think it was Sept. 12 or 13) the Aquitania Docked in New York. Five of us, all students invited to Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati in order to pursue rabbinic studies, had arrived in the New World, refugees from the Nazis.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The trip had lasted eight days and I still have three major recollections of that voyage.

One had to do with my insufficient knowledge of English (my reading knowledge was quite fair). We were eating in the kosher section of the ship and were seated at a large round dining room table. A man with a yellow sweater repeatedly rose during the meal, leaning forward in my direction and appearing to make a German-type bow, while saying something in English. At last I got the idea, I too rose, bowed in return, and responded "My name is Plaut." There was laughter from the man's friends. Only afterwards did I understand its cause: He had been asking me to pass him the salt and pepper.

My two other recollections are sea sickness (which I shared with my cabin mate Wolli Kaelter, now rabbi emeritus of a Long Beach, Calif. congregation), and meeting a law student from New York by the name of Beatrice. She had just come back from a tour of the Soviet Union and held distinctly leftist views, which however, she did not try to impose on us. She spent a good deal of time with us, introducing us to American ways and teaching me how to dance.

On a lovely September day, the Statue of Liberty came into view. Whatever sentimentalists may claim about its impact, it is only a fraction of what it means to the confused new arrival who faces a world he does not understand. Somehow the lady calms one's anxieties, and the unspoken promise — I did not yet know the words written by Emma Lazarus — was real. She was shrouded a bit in the morning fog, but her hand lifted high was clearly in view. I suddenly felt that America might mean more to me than a place for study.

I had with me a letter from the Berlin branch of the famous Warburg family. I had been the tutor of young Oskar, who had come down with polio and was incapable of attending school. The Warburg home was located in the beautiful suburb of Wannsee (not too far, I would learn later, from where a few years afterwards Heydrich would hold the infamous conference which approved the plan to exterminate all Jews in Europe).

I took my letter to the office of Kuhn, Loeb and Co. on Wall Street and was received by the scion of the family. He greeted me cordially and promised to let his friends in Cincinnati know that I was on my way. In retrospect, I know what it meant: the doors of the best families in town were wide-open — a considerable plus for a stranger in a strange land.

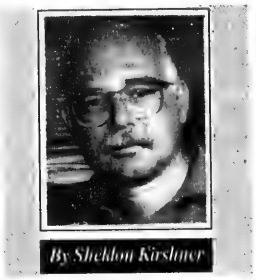
If anyone had told me at the time that some day I would live not in the United States but in Canada, I probably would have considered it as an absurd notion. I knew nothing about Canada, not even — though I was an avid sports fan — about its ice hockey. It would take me another 26 years to make that fortuitous acquaintance. I came to the United States as a refugee and to Canada as an immigrant.

(Parts of these recollections are taken from the rabbi's autobiography, Unfinished Business. A follow-up volume, More Unfinished Business, is now in the planning stages.)

The Kirshner File

Peace policies divide American Jews

Later this month, the Israeli government plans to launch a publicity blitz in the United States to explain its peace policies to American Jews, primarily the Orthodox.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Described as a "damage control mission" by one Anglo-Jewish weekly, the campaign will be spearheaded by retired Israeli generals and pro-peace rabbis who believe that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's handling of the peace process is beneficial to Israel's long-term security as well as its economy.

That such a drive is required is a telling commentary on the reception Israel's policies have received from segments of the Jewish community since Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles (DoP) on Sept. 13, 1993.

The DoP not only signalled the end of Israel's bitter military struggle with the PLO. It opened the way for territorial compromise, the evacuation of Jewish settlers from the territories, and the possible formation of a Palestinian state on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. In short, it sowed the seeds of a political solution of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Yet Israel's historic rapprochement with the PLO, which has yet to run its course, was a wrenching experience for some Jews because it overturned cherished assumptions about the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Hadn't a succession of Israeli leaders, from Golda Meir onward, excoriated the PLO? Hadn't they demeaned PLO chairman Yasser Arafat? Hadn't they encouraged Jews to settle in Judea, Samaria, Gaza and the Golan Heights? Hadn't they argued that Israel had no viable Palestinian interlocutors?

The DoP brought these emotive issues into perspective and, most important of all, triggered a debate of monumental proportions — not just in Israel but throughout the Diaspora.

The debate, which has grown incrementally rancorous with the boom of Palestinian rejectionist terrorist bombings, has reached its apotheosis in the world's largest Jewish community, the United States.

Surveys conducted by the American Jewish Committee show that the overwhelming majority of American Jews supports the peace process, despite fears, doubts and misgivings about its practical application.

The polls also reveal that one distinct group is resolutely against it — the Orthodox, who generally perceive it as a betrayal of halachic principles and an existential threat to Israel's very existence.

In this respect, the Orthodox are the mirror image and natural allies of right-wing Israelis in the so-called national/religious camp, who have lined up against the letter and spirit of the DoP.

Spokesperson representing the Orthodox have gone public with their criticism of the Israeli government. By doing so, they have consciously and knowingly destroyed an article of faith which was once at the bedrock of the community's ethos.

Before the Labor party unseated the Likud bloc in the June 1992 general election, there was a consensus that public criticism of Israel's policies, rightly or wrongly, was simply unacceptable. Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir — the Likud prime ministers during this period -- condoned this position, realizing that most Jews were not necessarily comfortable with their hardline ideological stance.

Dissent, then, was frowned upon, even suppressed, by the powers-that-be in the community. Jews who called for a moderate/progressive approach to the Arab-Israeli imbroglio, particularly with regard to its Palestinian component, were shushed up, shunted aside and/or denounced as traitors to the Zionist cause.

Not surprisingly, the enforcers were usually right-of-centre Jews sympathetic to the Likud.

But with the re-emergence of the Labor party three years ago, the nature of the debate changed radically.

When Rabin — a former chief of staff and ambassador to Washington — declared that Israel's policies were heading in a different direction, he was greeted with a mixture of incredulity, indignation and anger.

In the United States, Norman Podhoretz, the editor of Commentary, fired one of the first shots across the bow.

Since his famous or infamous article decrying the Labor party's orientation, the flak has not stopped flying:

•Rabbi Avraham Hecht, president of the Rabbinical Alliance of America, charged that anyone who relinquishes territory to the Arabs is a moser (a person who betrays a Jew to a gentile).

•Rabbi Ahron Soloveichik, a renowned Torah scholar, lambasted the peace process, saying that an Israeli withdrawal is forbidden.

•Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, the chancellor of Yeshiva University in New York, wondered in the Jewish Week whether Israel has "not only lost its soul but also its mind."

•The Lubavitch movement, in a Jerusalem Post ad, demanded that not "one inch" of land be forfeited, and accused Israel of having embarked on a "reckless path of appeasement."

Apart from these rabbinic pronouncements, there have been unprecedented manifestations of unease and disgust with Israel's course:

•Pro-Likud organizations, ranging from the Coalition for Israel to Pro Israel, have taken out provocative newspaper ads claiming that Rabin has no "legitimate mandate" to give up territory.

•Ruth Wisse, a professor of Yiddish and comparative literature at Harvard, has said that "American Jewry must advance maximalist positions to give Israel maximum leverage in its negotiations."

And in a bid to undermine Rabin, a loose coalition of right-wing Jewish groups, conservative politicians and the Likud have urged the U.S. Congress to block the deployment of American troops on the Golan to monitor a peace agreement between Israel and Syria; to declare the Middle East Facilitation Act — which channels financial aid to the PLO — null and void; and to move the U.S. embassy in Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

In addition, American Jews suspicious of Israeli policy have sent money to, and "adopted," Jewish settlements in the territories.

And, reports the Jewish Week in New York, Orthodox Jews are shifting their charitable donations away from the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) toward funds backing the settlers. (The UJA does not support projects across the Green Line).

As a result of these developments, and the increasing shrillness of the ongoing debate on peace, the fault line in American Jewry has widened, causing a deep rift in the community. Mindful of the acrimony, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations recently issued an appeal for "civility of debate and behavior."

The Israeli government is so concerned by all this that Uri Savir — director-general of Israel's Foreign Ministry and an architect of the Oslo accord — has called on American Jews to be more vociferous in their support of Rabin's peace policies.

As observers have noted, there is presently an imbalance in the response of American Jews to the peace process.

The right-wing opposition is highly vocal, visible and motivated, which was also true prior to 1992.

On the other hand, the majority that backs Rabin is more or less silent, with the notable exceptions of Americans for Peace Now and the Israel Policy Forum.

Americans for Peace Now has been a pillar of support, while the Israel Policy Forum has encouraged rabbis to use their pulpits on the High Holidays to praise Rabin's policies.

Preparing for Day of Judgment

By EDGAR ASHER

On the Shabbat immediately following the fast of Tisha b'Av we are reminded that in just seven weeks, the most intense spiritual period in the Jewish calendar will commence.

Ten days after Rosh Hashanah is the solemn fast day of Yom Kippur and shortly after that, the festival of Sukkot. In Israel, Sukkot lasts seven days, while in the Diaspora it is eight days, concluding with Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah. In Israel, Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah are linked and celebrated on the same day.

GUEST VOICES

The seven Shabbatot prior to Rosh Hashanah are known as the Shabbatot of Consolation. On each Shabbat, we read in the Haftorah a different passage from the prophet Isaiah. The themes of the readings are messages of encouragement and hope. Even though the Jews have seen the destruction of two temples and suffered persecution throughout the ages, the prophet tells us that G-d has commanded him to comfort Israel and proclaim the restoration of Zion.

The seven readings reach their culmination on the Shabbat before Rosh Hashanah with a cry of spiritual joy and closeness to G-d.

Such is the unique importance of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur that we prepare ourselves in the month before Rosh Hashanah (Elul) by introducing several minhagim (customs) that prepare us for the Day of Judgment.

From the second day of Elul until the day before Rosh Hashanah, the shofar is blown daily at the end of the morning service, except on Shabbat. This is to recall the second ascent of Moses on Mount Sinai to receive the Tablets of Law. The blasts are sounded to remind the children of Israel not to err once again and return to idolatry, as they did with the sin of the Golden Calf.

The shofar is not blown on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, in order to distinguish the sound of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah itself, which is prescribed by the Torah, from the blowing during the previous month, which is only a custom.

The other minhag associated with the period is the recitation of Selichot. Selichot is the plural form of the Hebrew word for forgiveness. It describes a series of penitential prayers that are themselves not an integral part of the Jewish liturgy, but are recited on certain solemn days and fast days.

The Selichot that are read before Rosh Hashanah until the eve of Yom Kippur are the most important of the year.

Since the introduction of Selichot, probably in the sixth or seventh century CE, the contents have changed somewhat with piyutim (liturgical poems) and pizmonim (hymns) being added.

The central motif of the pre-Rosh Hashanah Selichot is the recurring repetition of the Thirteen Attributes (Exodus 34, 6-7), which tell us of G-d's infinite mercy.

Each day, usually immediately before the morning service, the Selichot prayers are said, commencing with Psalm 145. Then the poems and hymns are introduced and the Thirteen Attributes are repeated several times.

When Selichot were first introduced, the custom was to recite them only during the Ten Days of Penitence between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Several hundred years later, the period for reciting Selichot was extended to include the days before Rosh Hashanah.

Almost 1,000 years ago, Rabbi David Hai Gaon introduced a ruling that Selichot should be recited for 40 days, beginning at the start of the month of Elul.

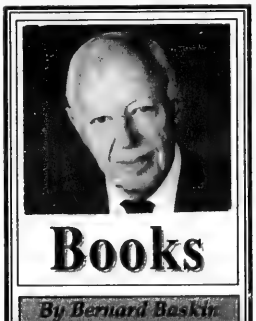
Sephardim maintain that custom to this day, while Ashkenazi tradition calls for the recitation of Selichot to commence only on the Sunday before Rosh Hashanah. If however the festival falls on a Monday or Tuesday — as it does this year — Selichot are said from the Sunday of the previous week.

In Israel, Ashkenazi tradition considers the first day of Selichot as a little more significant than the following days. Although the prayers for the first day are in essence much the same as those on subsequent days, the first day proclaims the start of the period leading up to the Yamim Hanora'im (Days of Awe).

Selichot are normally first recited around midnight on the Saturday night prior to Rosh Hashanah.

Every year, the main television channel in Israel broadcasts live transmissions of Selichot services, choosing different groups from among Sephardim and Ashkenazim for each day's broadcast.

It is easy to understand that great rabbis and teachers wanted to ensure that we were prepared spiritually to observe G-d's commandments for the observance of the festivals ordained in the Torah. Although the Yamim Hanora'im are among the most solemn days of the year, the Torah does not command us to do anything particular in the days immediately before the High Holy Days. Selichot is an ideal way to lead us to the Day of Judgment.



Books

By Bernard Baskin

Sacrifice of Isaac, by Neil Gordon (Random House, $31).

When Gen. Yossef Benami dies all Israel mourns. He was a legendary personality: military hero, scholar, statesman and discriminating art collector. Above all, he was revered as the savior of 400 Viennese Jews. During the early years of World War II, he had developed and operated a hazardous escape route that led through Europe to Palestine.

Benami's two "problem" sons become the inheritors of his considerable estate. Luke, who lives in New York and works as a translator of film dialogue, comes to Jerusalem. Disaffected, critical of Israel, he was never able to relate emotionally to his distant father.

From Danni, the older son, comes a crypic message requesting that his share of the estate — the works of art — be converted into cash. In 1973, during Israel's invasion of Lebanon, Danni had shocked his father and friends by deserting from the army and becoming an elusive political exile, hiding somewhere in Europe.

This multilayered and complex thriller follows Luke in his search for his missing brother. The scene moves from Paris to Florence to Capri. Before the journey is completed Luke is involved in the mysterious murder of his brother's mistress, kills an unknown assailant in a Paris gunfight and uncovers an emotionally shattering secret about his father.

"So it was that Luke lost his much-feared father. In the bitter rain of a Jerusalem winter. And found his long-lost brother in a blossoming French spring. So it was that he shot at his brother with his brother's own gun and the bullet dropped his brother like a split bag of sand into the shadows of the street."

Among the characters that Luke encounters are his brother's partner, a shrewd dealer in fraudulent antiquities, and a young German girl who is also in search of Danni. She believes he knows the answers to troubling questions about her Nazi father.

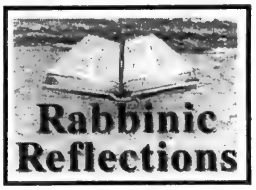
Neil Gordon, scholar and literary editor, has written a suspenseful thriller in which the Holocaust and the creation of Israel figure prominently. He artfully blances a many-sided, gripping story with psychological insight into the motivations and reactions of diverse characters. At the end, the jagged pieces of the puzzle fit neatly and deftly together.

One day in the Uffizi Galleries in Florence, Luke discovers in Caravaggio's painting of the sacrifice of Issac a profound and inescapable truth. "For what Caravaggio painted was not an isolated moment in Jewish history but a turning point for humankind ... From that moment on, that power — of symbolism — would be held ascendant over the primitive power of scarifice and that ascendancy would define the thin bridge of civilization that unites our present to Abraham's past."

The biblical depiction highlights the dilemmas that give this novel its moral texture: filial duty, patriotism, choice and decision.

Sacrifice of Isaac is entertaining and provocative — a well told, powerful and serious story.

God seeks an honest partner



By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

A thief was brought to court. At the trial, the judge said, "It seems that you committed the theft yourself."

"Of course I did it myself!" the thief exclaimed. "Who can get an honest partner nowadays?"

In our summer study of the prayers we offer, the third benediction of the Amida, called Kedusha, or Kedushat HaShem, is about God's looking for an honest partner, not just nowadays, but throughout Jewish history.

In the evening, the prayer reads, "Atah kadosh veshimchah kadosh, ukedoshim bechol yom yehallelucha sela; baruch Atah Adoshem ha-hakadosh." (You are holy, Your name is holy, and holy ones praise You every day. Blessed are You, the holy God.)

Kadosh means set apart, sacredly different. Kadosh, kiddush, Kedusha, Kaddish all share common meanings. At an evening service, we say that God is holy. Then we say God's name is holy. This is the point in the prayer at which God begins to look for an honest partner.

What is the meaning of the word shem (name)? We might seriously declare that God's shem, God's name, is yod-hay-vav-hay. These four Hebrew letters constitute a holy name which we are not permitted to pronounce. Instead we say, "Adonai" (my Lord), when we see it in the Torah or in the prayerbook, and HaShem (the Name), when used in a non-holy context.

But I submit that shem has another and far more important meaning. If you ask, "What's his name?" you will receive the nonsense syllables by which the man calls himself — John Doe. If, however, you ask, "How's his name in the community?" you will receive a critique of his reputation. People's names also represent their reputation. The words are synonyms.

How does a business earn a good reputation? Those who represent it carry on their work ethically and with careful service to the needs of the client. How does God earn a good reputation? Those who represent the Holy One carry God's reputation for ethics and service into the world. How? By acting kadosh themselves.

How do Jews act kadosh? Read Leviticus, Chapter 19, and you'll see it's by having just weights and measures, honoring the wise and the aged, loving our neighbors, keeping Shabbat and many other day to day acts. These define us Jews as kadosh.

So when the prayer says, Ukedoshim bechol yom yehallelucha (holy ones praise You daily), that praise consists not just of words, but of actions. We're the honest partner that God seeks.

That daily praise, best given through action, but often given by word, is our own expression not only that we are partners, but also that we recognize to what extent our rich Jewish heritage has been a partnership and not simply of our own creation.

A story from Jewish immigrant days tells of the man who, upon meeting a friend, told him he was going into business.

"What sort of business?" the friend asked.

"A partnership," the other replied.

"Are you putting in much capital?"

"No. I put in no capital. I put in the experience."

"And he puts in the capital, is that it?"

"Yes. We go into business for three years. He puts in the capital and I put in the experience. At the end of three years, I will have the capital and he will have the experience."

Our relationship with haKadosh Baruch Hu has extended far longer than three years. Torah has been the capital and we have, indeed, had the experience, and even made the capital our own in so many ways. All that we are asked to do is to praise and thank the partner by word and deed. "Kedoshim bechol yom yehallelucha sela," (Those who are holy praise You every day.

High Holy Days offer chance to discover faith's moral power

Throughout history, the people of Israel saw itself as God's beloved. The Song of Songs was interpreted as a dramatic metaphor describing the passionate love affair between Israel and God.

Jews made great sacrifices to continue Jewish life because they believed that there was something of ultimate importance in the continuity of the Jewish people. Human history required Israel to bear witness to the presence of God in the world.

People touched by the vision of the prophet believe that God has a stake in how Jews conduct their lives. It is my fervent hope that nationalism and the enormous focus on survival will not be pursued at the expense of the spiritual world view that originally gave significance to our survival. For serious Jewish youth to identify with the Jewish community, they must find a way to understand the Living God of Israel.

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur provide us with the opportunity to discover the moral and spiritual power present in a life of faith. The concern for the well-being of the State of Israel or the Holocaust must not become the new religion of the Jews. We dare not separate loyalty to the Jewish people from loyalty to Torah. To do so would be spiritual and physical suicide and the greater threat to Jewish continuity. Without serious reflection on how Jews were meant to bear witness to God in history, all our efforts to promote Jewish continuity will end up being hollow programmatic techniques without any lasting effect on Jewish history. How wonderful it is that Jews throughout the world intuitively understand that at least on Yom Kippur they must be present in the synagogue.

3. The government plans to release further security prisoners. A review of this is necessitated by the massacre. Why not by a bipartisan committee? And why not with the participation of relatives of victims of Arab terror? It is the least the country can do for them.

4. Inasmuch as Anwar al-Sadat got the whole Sinai, Hafez al-Assad keeps demanding — repeatedly, monotously — the whole Golan. Monotonously, kneejerkwise, Israel responds by blaming Menachem Begin for its negotiating difficulties. Why not, instead of blaming Begin, get help from him? Next time Assad asks, why not reply, "You come to Jerusalem, as Sadat did. Till then we have nothing to talk about."

5. "Likud stands for fear, Labor for hope." Shimon Peres said this, just prior to the massacre. What he (and Rabin) said afterwards I will not cite, for I want to help narrow the split not contribute to widening it. But, rising like Weizman to statesmanship, this Peres might have said: "We, all of us, have reason to fear and all of us, hopefully, reason to hope."

Had Peres said this, he would have given expression to the basic Israeli — nay, Jewish — condition in our time.

P.S. The latest attack does nothing to alter my argument.

Holocaust centre marks its 10th anniversary

By GERDA FRIEBERG
Special to The CJN

On Sept. 15, we will mark the 10th anniversary of the opening of the Toronto Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

Despite the visits of up to 20,000 students annually and numerous appeals to register the names of the victims to be inscribed in the hall of memory, the centre seems to be a well kept secret in our community.

On this 10th anniversary, it is important to recall the centre's history and the people who were committed to remember, to teach and to leave a legacy for future generations.

For many years, survivors were unable to share their memories. It was too painful for both the storyteller and the listener. Our silence arose from the fear that the indescribable horror would not be believed. The necessity to create a memorial was discussed for years among survivors. The concern was to find a suitable location and raise the funds, but most of all, to find people willing and able to embark on such a project with the devotion and sensitivity it demanded.

The opportunity came when the Lipa Green Building was being planned. The building fundraising committee approached two survivors, Jack Israeli and David Smuschkowitz, who agreed to contribute to the building fund, provided space for a Holocaust memorial was allocated.

Steps were immediately undertaken by a small committee of survivors to create the Toronto Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre. Utilizing the limited space was a monumental task, since the story to be told had to begin with anti-Semitism in medieval Europe, the rise of Nazism, the destruction of European Jewry and liberation, and come full circle, to deal with neo-Nazis and Holocaust-deniers.

Two thousand archival photos were obtained from all over the world, of which those considered most appropriate were selected.

Two slide presentations were created to portray the events as they unfolded. The artifacts exhibited come from survivors and from Auschwitz and Majdanek.

While the educational aspect of the centre is important, the memory of the victims was our most sacred obligation.

A hall of memories was therefore created, where the walls were covered with ceramic tiles, on which the names of family members and victims of the Holocaust were inscribed. This project is still ongoing and more names are being added all the time.

To raise the necessary funds was a major challenge. The committee undertook to raise enough funds, not only for the creation but also for the future maintenance of the centre. We were able to achieve this through the generosity of survivors, some members of the Toronto Jewish community, a grant from the federal government and a very generous grant from the Province of Ontario. We were happy to meet our objective not to use any community funds for this project.

On opening day, we symbolically presented the key of the centre to the then Toronto Jewish Congress. For the last 10 years, survivors have welcomed thousands of students of many ethnic backgrounds from Metro Toronto and surrounding areas.

In the guest book are the names of visitors from all over the world. It was the first Holocaust centre in Canada and it became the focal point for Holocaust education. Visiting the centre and listening to a personal account of a survivor have a profound effect on young people.

It is our hope that these youngsters will not become prey to neo-Nazis or Holocaust-deniers. If this place helps teach tolerance and erase prejudice, we have achieved our goal. We have hopefully created a better world for our children and at the same time, provided a place where they will find the names of their families, a place to remember, a place to say Kaddish for those with no one left to say it for them.

The members of the founding committee had a dream: to teach and to remember. We leave it to future generations to continue.

Gerda Friedberg, past chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, was also the chair of the founding committee of the Toronto Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre. She is now its honorary chair.

CLARIFICATION

The Batsheva Dance Company of Israel will give three other performances at the Bluma Appel Theatre, Sept. 13, 15 and 16, in addition to the concert Sept. 14 on behalf of the Canada Israel Cultural Foundation. These performances open the Harborfront Dance season.

THE THREE YEAR VISION

IT'S LOOKING BETTER EVERY DAY

JOYCE EKLOVE

"When I first learned about the three year vision I was skeptical. Why should I make a pledge now for each of the 1996, 1997 and 1998 campaigns? But the more I thought about it, the more sense it made. We can't just plan year by year. Everybody plans for their future. Why shouldn't the community? And, when it's so easy to help, why shouldn't I do my part?

Joyce Eklove

MARK HALPERN

"As an experienced canvasser, I know how time consuming it is to talk to the same people about their gift every year. I also know how many non-contributors I can't contact because I'm too busy canvassing contributors. The three year vision will give me the time to reach so many new donors who are essential for the campaign's financial stability.

Mark Halpern

"The men and women who built our Jewish community had a dream about the kind of community they wanted for their children and grandchildren. Now it's our turn to dream. The three year vision will allow us to maintain and improve our internationally acclaimed quality of Jewish life. With funds already pledged for the next three years we can also assure Jews in danger anywhere in the world that UJA will be there to rescue them."

Author tells more tales of Mulroney era

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Just when Brian Mulroney thought it might be safe to show his face in public again.

Boom!

Out comes Stevie Cameron with an updated edition of On the Take — last year's bestseller exposé of greed, scandal, crime and corruption during the Mulroney years in Ottawa.

This latest instalment in paperback format includes three new chapters featuring at least five more juicy stories to outrage Canadians.

A number of Mulroney pals have been charged with or pleaded guilty to tax evasion; others are under police investigation, have declared bankruptcy or are fighting creditors.

A Conservative fundraiser told Cameron that his riding had been offered a Senate seat. It didn't matter whom they chose as senator, as long as they tossed $100,000 into a Montreal bank account set up for Mulroney's leadership bid.

The Mounties are investigating the link between the purchase of $2 billion worth of Airbus jets by Air Canada and a number of secret commissions paid through European banks to a Liechtenstein holding company controlled by persons unknown. What a strange way for a Canadian airline to buy a fleet of jets!

Mulroney's in-laws, the Pivnickis, who live in fashionable Westmount, were given a contract with the RCMP to take in seven Mountie boarders on training courses, one month at a time, at $800 a head. It was a piddling contract, worth only $28,000 a year, hardly enough to get rich on, but it earned the Pivnickis the hostility of another family, the one that lost the Mountie contract.

Mulroney's elderly mom, Irene Mulroney, had her old age pension cheque delivered personally right to her home every month by a post office employee other than a mailman. It allowed her to get her cheque two days before everybody else, without ever having to worry whether it was lost in the mail. She never knew about the special arrangement. She thought the post office did this for everybody.

The Tory apologists are sure to reply that only Stevie Cameron would stoop so low as to go after Mulroney's mother.

They have to say something.

When the hard cover edition came out, the Tories said Cameron wrote the book because she was jealous of Mila Mulroney.

Senator Marjory LeBreton, appointed by Mulroney to the Senate, his final appointment before stepping down, went even further. She said Cameron wrote her book because she was jealous that she wasn't as good-looking as Mila. Strike one up for the cause of feminism, Marjory.

No one asked LeBreton why the rest of the country bought the Cameron book in such great numbers. Maybe we are all jealous and ugly too.

Mulroney is the politician Canadians love to despise. He's been gone now for more than two years and he's not likely to come back in the near future. So why the fixation with the Mulroney era corruption?

It's almost as if Canadians are trying to make up for having loved Mulroney so much in 1984, during his first year in power. He was as popular then as Jean Chrétien was in his first year in office. (Mulroney hit 63 per cent, Chrétien 64 per cent.) Maybe there's a warning here for Chrétien.

The original version of the Cameron book sold more than 100,000 copies, making it a bestseller 10 times over. In Canada, 10,000 copies is considered a bestseller. It cost Cameron five years of her life, but the rewards are there, although she has noticed that she hasn't been getting many dinner invitations from Tories anymore.

Cameron says that after the hard cover edition came out she had to beat away people who kept coming to her with still more Mulroney tales. Only time and space — and impatient editors — have prevented her from writing more.

She still has a huge binder full of untold Mulroney stories that will have to remain untold for the time being.

There definitely will not be an On The Take II, she vows. She's had it up to here with Mulroney. (So have Canadians, by the way.)

There's a new government in Ottawa and plenty of other things to ferret out.

So finally, Mulroney may have heard the last of Stevie Cameron. It won't be any too soon, either. He may finally be able to enjoy his fortune in peace.

CJC-Q urges hiring extra referendum staff

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) said it is urging Quebec's chief returning officer, Pierre-F. Cote, to hire more staff in order to process potentially thousands of applications from out-of-province Quebecers who want to vote in the referenduum, reportedly almost certain to take place Oct. 30.

Applications to vote coming from outside Quebec would have to be received by Cote's office no later than four weeks before the referendum.

"We want to be sure enough people are hired to process the number of applications," said Casper Bloom, primarily by contacting synagogues across the country.

Last week, the Quebec Liberal Party said it would use funds from its own coffers to try to directly reach potential out-of-province voters. Cote said his office could CJC-Q director Jack Jedwab, since Cote's office might find itself swamped by a flood of applications.

CJC-Q has been cooperating with the overall effort to reach an estimated 40,000 to 50,000 eligible out-of-province voters, launched by Montreal lawyer not do so since it would require "consensus" from both of Quebec's two main parties.

Inside the province, where 42,000 enumerators spent last week compiling the province's first permanent electoral list in time for the referendum, Jedwab said initial reports were that the "process was going smoothly," the result of an "effective" information campaign aimed at making sure that as many Quebecers as possible register and have proper documentation on hand.

At writing, Jedwab said there appeared to be only "very rare" instances in which enumerators may have abused their powers.

In one instance, Congress sent a letter to Cote asking that he fire one Parti Quebecois enumerator in the riding of NDG for stating that he would ask for proof of Canadian citizenship based on the "race" of the person being enumerated.

In general, Jedwab said Cote has appeared to be dilligent in protecting against possible abuse.

Court rejects refugee claim by ex-Soviet olim

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the second time in less than a year, the Federal Court of Canada has upheld a decision by an immigration panel that denied asylum to Russian emigres who came to Canada after fleeing Israel.

The ruling is another chapter in a continuing dispute between Ottawa and Jerusalem over Canada's policy of accepting claims by ex-Soviets that they were persecuted in Israel.

In an August 24 ruling, Justice John Richard agreed that an Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) panel was right to reject the refugee claims of a family from the former Soviet Union who argued that while in Israel, they were harassed and persecuted because of their questionable status as Jews.

In 1991, Yuri Botnarenko, his wife Aksana and their son Yulian moved from Ukraine to Israel, where they received citizenship under the Law of Return.

But the family claimed they fell into the category of "non-Jews" — those whose parents are not Jewish but who have at least one Jewish grandparent — enough to satisfy the Law of Return.

The family alleged that in Israel, Aksana had been sexually harassed; that Yuri was detained by police after he confronted neighbors who had been threatening his wife; and that their son was mistreated at a nursery — all due to their mixed status.

In rejecting their bid for refugee status, the IRB tribunal had concluded there would be no serious possibility of persecution if the family returned to Israel "since they were subject only to discrimination, and the State of Israel [had] the ability to protect them."

Richard agreed the family failed to show that Israel was incapable of protecting them.

The ruling is similar to one issued by the Federal Court last December, in which it upheld the IRB's denial of refugee status to a family, originally from Kazakhstan, who springboarded to Canada from Israel.

In that instance, the court agreed with the IRB that there was no evidence that Israel persecutes "those persons whom they have invited to come to their country."

The court held that discrimination — if there was any — did not amount to persecution.

Despite the court rulings, the long-simmering dispute between Canada and Israel is bound to continue in light of the number of refugee claims accepted from Israeli citizens, the vast majority of them from the former Soviet republics.

In the first six months of 1995, Canada accepted 67 refugee claims from Israeli citizens, out of 238 initiated.

And last year, Canada accepted more refugees from Israel — 380 — than in the previous five years combined.

That's despite ongoing efforts by Israel to convince Canada that it does not produce refugees and that claims of persecution by ex-Soviets are spurious.

Those claims typically allege harassment, mistreatment of children, job discrimination and even beatings and rape because of mixed marriages and family histories.

Susan Davis, national executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, said there are many instances of "personal bias" on the part of IRB members.

"It's hard for board members to understand that there can be a democracy in a religious state," Davis said, adding that Israel has had difficulty in proving that ex-Soviet olim are not persecuted.

Jewish TV show to debut soon

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada's first-ever national Jewish-content television program may be on the air as soon as next month.

The Jewish Journal, a 30-minute magazine-format show, will be broadcast on Vision TV, which reaches more than six million households.

The show is scheduled to debut in late October or early January.

Executive producers Doris Strub Epstein and Tamara Ushakova, both with extensive media experience, have joined forces with Janice Maser, the director of business development and marketing, to form a non-profit corporation.

"We have a sense of mission," says Epstein, though all three organizers have other professions. "We have joined forces out of a commitment to fill this unmet need in the Jewish community."

Ushakova, an artist, filmmaker and businesswoman, came to Canada nine years ago from Tbilisi, Georgia, where she worked in television, film and theatre.

She says she was surprised to learn there was no Jewish television show in Canada. "There is so much Jewish talent and so many resources — it's unbelievable and a shame that these are not being used."

It's time, she said, that someone said something positive and realistic about Israel and the Jewish community in North America.

"Children and young people must see themselves as Jews in a positive way."

Maser says there's a lot of interest in sponsoring and supporting the program.

"We are determined that high-quality, Jewish programming will reach every corner of our country, particularly [to] those who are not affiliated, our youth and those isolated Jewishly. And we hope that this will be the first step to a Jewish television channel."

To be hosted by author, raconteur and humorist Allan Gould, the program promises an exploration of Jewish life in Canada, Israel and around the world.

Among the topics planned are neo-Nazism as seen through the eyes of a Canadian journalist who secretly infiltrated the movement; the meaning behind Jewish jokes; and questions facing the Jewish community.

Books and theatre reviews, Klezmer and other music, Jewish personalities, news from Israel, business, Jewish cooking and historical events are other segments proposed.

Along with commercial sponsorships, the producers are looking for individuals and foundations to underwrite special programs, such as biographies and shows on travel.

The producers have received encouragement and good wishes from politicians and community leaders, including a letter from Israel's minister of Foreign Affairs Shimon Peres and a note from Israeli vice consul in Toronto, Haim Waxman.

JNF names Pacific shaliach

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — An Israel Defence Force brigadier-general is the new Jewish National Fund (JNF) shaliach for the Pacific region.

Yitzhak Fuchs succeeds Gideon Shavit, who has returned to his home in Beersheva.

Fuchs' appointment was announced last week by JNF regional chair Ruth Freeman, who said the new emissary is planning the annual Yom Kippur campaign and will make his first visit to a major British Columbia Jewish community, Victoria, on Sept. 17.

Fuchs, 46, was born in Germany and brought to Israel by his parents after the War of Independence. He has served in the IDF for 28 years and saw action as a paratrooper in the Sinai in the Yom Kippur War.

He has been a military man almost all his adult life, except for time spent at Bar Ilan University, where he got his BA in Social Services and an MA in Political Science and International Relations at the University of Haifa. He is also trained in management and systems analysis.

Before taking a leave of absence to come to Canada, Fuchs was deputy chief of the IDF personnel branch, where he was responsible for manpower policy. He was also the IDF's liaison to civilian groups.

Fuchs is married and he and his wife have three children who, he says, are "thrilled" to be in Vancouver, especially because it's the first time the family has lived outside of Israel.

Fuchs says the recent forest fire near Jerusalem was the largest and most devastating in Israel's history. The destruction of millions of trees and many homes "adds a sense of urgency to the JNF role in Israel — and adds a degree of importance to my job here."

Alberta gets emissary

CALGARY — There's a new JNF shaliach in Alberta: Lt.-Col. Ron Krumer replaces Shemi Attar, who returns to Israel after a three-year stint.

Krumer has worked in the prime minister's office for the past three years as first assistant to the Director General. He has 20 years service in the IDF and was the IDF's chief liasion officer to the press during the Gulf War.

Krumer will be located in Calgary, but the head office for Alberta JNF remains in Edmonton.

Jews, Ukrainians, Mennonites aim to build bridges

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — "A lot of preparatory work has to be done before a bridge can be built," noted Helmut-Harry Loewen in addressing North America's first-ever Jewish-Mennonite-Ukrainian conference. "Before you begin to build the bridge, you need to plunge into the depths of the murky water below and survey the bottom to clear away obstacles."

Building bridges was the theme of the recent three-day meeting held at the University of Manitoba's St. Paul's College. Speakers expressed surprise that it had taken the three ethnic/religious groups this long to come together, considering their shared history of religious and cultural persecution in Ukraine and their experiences in Canada.

Gerald Ramsay, professor of geography at the University of Windsor, said Canada's policies on multiculturalism keep ethnic groups apart.

"If these three groups can establish good relations now," he said, "it is a good sign for Canada as we enter the 21st century. If not, the omens for our society are dark indeed."

The conference grew out of a joint program four years ago that was co-sponsored by the Jewish Historical Society (JHS) of Western Canada, the Mennonite Historical Society and the Manitoba Historical Society.

Over 40 scholars, writers and community activists from across the continent presented papers to the conference on historical, cultural, religious and political issues affecting the three communities.

"We adopted the theme of building bridges," explained JHS president and historian Harry Gutkin, "because we were aware of the tensions between the communities, which goes back to shtetl days in Czarist Russia and continued after the three groups came to Manitoba. We felt it was time to explore all areas of the relationships."

Prof. Lionel Steiman of the University of Manitoba gave an overview of the history of anti-Semitism in Canada, highlighting the role of the Catholic Church and Abbe Lionel Groulx in Quebec; the fascist Adrien Arcand; and Goldwin Smith, an anti-Semitic polemicist in Ontario. Although Smith died in 1910, his writings influenced many Canadians, including former prime minister MacKenzie King, Steiman said.

Loewen, chair of Mennonite Studies at the University of Winnipeg, spoke of a "dark period" in Mennonite history — the inter-war years — when many Mennonites, particularly those in Germany — discarded their centuries-old principles of non-violence and flocked to Adolf Hitler.

They, like many others in the 1930s, saw Hitler as their savior from Communism, Loewen said.

While most Mennonites lost their enthusiasm for Nazism after Hitler's atrocities against the Jews came to light, Loewen noted that anti-Semitism remains among some Canadian Mennonites.

Aware of history

He identified some who are prominent in hate groups or have been charged in hate-related violence, alleging there is a predominantly Mennonite town in Alberta where support for neo-Nazism is strong and where many receive German-language mailings from Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, spoke of the often stormy relationship between Jews and Ukrainians in Canada, describing how they have taken opposite sides on issues ranging from prosecution of Nazi war criminals to how each views Ukrainian nationalist figures.

But Littman observed how well the new generation of Jewish and Ukrainian Canadians work together in many professions.

"The new generation should be aware of their history," he said, "but they should not feel compelled to relive it. This new relationship offers great hope for the future."

FOOD

Where no brisket has gone before

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

As a service to the community, the Kashruth Council provides kashrut and food-related information to thousands of families across Canada and the United States, and as far as Israel and Europe, says Rabbi Mordechai Levin, the council's executive director.

Esther Schwartz, the council's kosher food consultant, prepares and tests the recipes. The recipes for Rosh Hashanah 1995-5756 include ratatouille soup, Polynesian pot roast, lemony carrots, individual potato kugels and apple pie.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list, call the Kashruth Council 416-635-9550, or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3V2.

RATATOUILLE SOUP

Make ahead to enhance flavor. Freezes well.

2 tbsp. olive oil
2 large onions, sliced
2 large garlic cloves, crushed
2 medium zucchini, sliced
1 medium eggplant, peeled and cubed
1 green and red pepper, seeded and cut in chunks (or any color pepper)
1 28 oz. can crushed tomatoes
2 cups vegetable or chicken stock
Salt and pepper to taste
1 tsp. basil
½ tsp. thyme
½ tsp. oregano
Pinch cayenne (optional)

In a large saucepan, heat oil. Add onion and garlic; saute only until soft and transparent. Add zucchini, eggplant and peppers. Cook five minutes until softened. Add the crushed tomatoes, stock and seasonings. Bring to a boil, reduce heat to low and simmer, covered for one hour. Serve chunky or transfer to food processor and blend until smooth. Serve hot or cold. Serves 6 to 8 (or more).

Note: If too thick, add extra stock.

POLYNESIAN POT ROAST

2 tbsp. oil
1 4-lb. chuck or brisket roast
¼ cup flaked coconut (optional)
¼ cup apricot preserves
1½ tsp. vinegar
1½ tbsp. soy sauce
½ tsp. ginger
½ tsp. grated lemon rind
1/8 tsp. pepper
¼ cup juice from canned pineapple or ¼ cup water
4 tbsp. cornstarch
2 tbsp. cold water

Garnish: Pineapple rings, watercress.

In hot oil, brown meat in a large skillet or Dutch oven. Combine remaining ingredients except for corn starch and water. Cover tightly; simmer until meat is tender, 2-2½ hours. Remove meat to heated platter. Skim fat from pan juices. Blend together the cornstarch and water. Add to pan juices; cook and stir until sauce thickens. Spoon some sauce over the roast: serve remaining sauce. Garnish with pineapple rings and watercress. Serves 6 to 8.

Food

Go for the garlic, or baste it with basil

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

If the kitchen is the heart of the home then herbs must be the soul. For thousands of years we've looked to herbs to season our foods, sweeten our hair and beautify our bodies. Not bad for plants that, for the most part, look like weeds.

Every country on this planet has specific herbs that are unique to its terraine. These indigenous herbs have a way of putting a distinctive flavor into a dish that makes you identify it with its country.

Face it, the difference between Pad Thai noodles from Thailand and noodles with a pesto sauce from Italy is that one uses basil and garlic and the other doesn't (well, actually there are a few other differences like peanuts and chili peppers, but you know what I mean).

As any good chef will tell you, fresh is best. However "fresh" isn't always available. In the event you don't grow your own herbs relax: fresh herbs are usually available at your local grocery.

As a last resort you can always use the dried stuff. It tastes almost the same as the fresh picked. It does however, lack the subtleness of the flavor you get when you use fresh herbs. The rule of thumb for dried versus fresh herbs is one to three. So if a recipe requires ½ teaspoon of dried dill you'll need 1½ teaspoons of the fresh.

So, throw caution to the wind and go for the garlic. Toss on the dill and baste it with basil and know that which ever herb you choose the next one's flavor is just a pinch away.

SAVORY BISCUITS WITH TOMATO BASIL BUTTER

Tomato Butter
½ cup peeled, seeded and chopped ripe tomatoes
1 stick unsalted butter
¾ tsp. minced garlic
1½ tsp.fresh thyme or ½ tsp. dried
3 tbsp. chopped fresh basil or 1 tbsp. dried
salt and pepper to taste

Savory Biscuit
2 cups all purpose flour, sifted
1 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. whipping cream
2 tsp. chopped fresh basil or ¼ tsp. dried

Preheat oven to 425. Place the tomatoes, butter, garlic, thyme and basil in the bowl of an electric mixer or food processor.

Beat or blend until the mixture is smooth and creamy and a light red color (about 3 to 4 minutes for the blender and 1 or 2 for the food processor). Season with salt and pepper. Shape butter into a log about 12 inches long and 1½ inches thick. Wrap tightly in plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 30 minutes. This can be prepared up to two days in advance.

To prepare the biscuits in a large bowl, sift together the flour, salt, basil and baking powder. Gradually stir in 1 cup of the cream and mix to form a soft dough. Knead lightly on a floured surface. Do not over knead. On a floured surface, roll out the dough to about ½ inch thick. Cut into rounds. Place on ungreased cookie sheet and brush top with remaining cream and bake for 13 to 15 minutes. Serve immediately with tomato basil butter. Makes 25 biscuits.

CHERRY TOMATOES WITH HERBED CHEESE STUFFING

8 oz. kosher ricotta or cottage cheese
⅔ cup grated kosher mozzarella cheese, divided
¼ cup kosher Parmesan cheese
¼ tsp. crushed red pepper flakes
1 tsp. grated orange zest
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
⅔ tbsp. chopped fresh mint
1 tbsp. minced garlic
Salt and pepper to taste
2 pints cherry tomatoes, stemmed
Sprigs of basil and mint for garnish

Preheat oven to 350. Combine the ricotta, ⅓ cup mozzarella and Parmesan cheese in a mixing bowl. Add the red pepper flakes, orange zest, chopped basil, mint and garlic. Mix well. Season with salt and pepper to taste. This filling can be made one day in advance. Cover and refrigerate.

Cut a thin slice from the bottom of each tomato so that the tomato will sit flat on the cookie sheet. Cut off the top of the tomato and scoop out the insides with a small spoon. Season the cavities generously with salt and pepper. Turn the tomatoes, hollowed out side down on paper towels and drain for 15 minutes. Stuff the tomatoes with the cheese filling, rounding the tops. Sprinkle generously with the remaining mozzarella cheese.

Place the tomatoes on a greased cookie sheets. Bake for 3 to 5 minutes. Remove and arrange on serving plate. Garnish with basil and mint sprigs. Serve hot. Makes about 40.

COLESLAW WITH DILLED MAYONNAISE

1 green cabbage, about 2 lbs., shredded
2 carrots, grated
1 small red onion, diced
⅓ cup chopped fresh dill or 5½ tsp. dried
Lemon juice
Salt and pepper to taste

Dilled Mayonnaise
1 cup mayonnaise
3 tbsp. chopped dill
1 tsp. ground mustard seed
¼ tsp. paprika
1 tsp. white horseradish, ground, optional

Combine all the vegetables together and set aside. In a smaller bowl combine all the ingredients for the dilled mayonnaise. Mix well. Pour over the cabbage mixture and stir. Makes 8 servings.

Food

Not quite a chicken soup

True, there's nothing like chicken soup for a holiday meal.

But these soup recipes from Foodland Ontario come close.

RUTABAGA AND CARROT SOUP

(Serves 6 to 8)

The flavors of rutabaga, carrots and apples make this a delicious soup the whole family will enjoy.

1 rutabaga
6 carrots
1 apple (optional)
2 cans (10 oz. kosher) condensed chicken bouillon
1 tsp. dried dillweed
1 tsp. brown sugar
½ cup non-dairy creamer
3 tbsp. chopped fresh dill

To make rutabaga easier to cut, microwave on double thickness of paper towel on High power for 7 min. Meanwhile, peel carrots and apple (if using); cut into ½ in. chunks. In large microwaveable bowl, combine carrots, apple, bouillon, dillweed and sugar; set aside.

Because of wax coating, remove rutabaga with 2 forks; rinse with cold water until cool enough to handle. Slice off peel; cut into ½-in. cubes and add to bowl. Cover with waxed paper; microwave on High power until vegetables are very tender, 15 to 20 min., stirring every 5 min.

In food processor, puree soup, in batches, until fairly smooth. Return to bowl. Add up to 3 cups water, ½ cup at a time, until almost as thin as desired. Stir in creamer (optional). Microwave until hot. Stir in 3 tbsp. fresh dill. Serve sprinkled with more fresh dill if desired.

RED CABBAGE AND PASTA SOUP WITH BEANS

(Serves 4)

2 cups chopped red cabbage
2 tbsp. lemon juice
4 tsp. olive oil
1 onion, chopped
2½ cups chicken broth
1 cup undrained canned tomatoes
Pinch hot pepper flakes
⅓ cup orzo (rice-shaped pasta)
1 can (19 oz.) Romano beans, drained and rinsed
Salt and pepper
Chopped parsley

Toss cabbage with lemon juice and set aside.

In medium saucepan, heat oil over medium heat; cook onion for 3 min. Add cabbage and cook, stirring, until tender, about 2 min. Stir in chicken broth, tomatoes, 1 cup water and hot pepper flakes; bring to boil. Add pasta and beans; return to simmer and cook, uncovered, for 6 to 8 min., stirring occasionally.

Season with salt and pepper to taste. Serve in heated bowls sprinkled with parsley.

ICED CUCUMBER SPINACH SOUP

(Serves 6)

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 medium onions, chopped
2 cucumbers, diced
1½ cups pareve chicken broth
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
2 cups spinach leaves
¼ cup chopped fresh dill (or 2 tsp. dried dill)
1 cup buttermilk

In large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Add onions and cook 10 min. or until soft. Set aside 1½ cups diced cucumber. Add remaining diced cucumber, broth, salt and pepper to saucepan. Cover and bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered 5 min. Stir in spinach and simmer 5 min. Puree in blender or food processor. Stir in dill. Chill 3 hr. or until serving time. Stir in buttermilk and reserved diced cucumber.

Rebbetzin a big winner with video that cooks

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

OK, I confess. I love watching cooking shows.

I love them even if the ingredients are ones I could never find in Toronto, if the recipes aren't kosher or if the methodology is so complex that it takes a chemistry PhD to work it out.

So imagine how pleased I was to discover A Taste of Shabbos, with Rebbetzin Esther Winner.

It's all kosher (as one would expect from a Lubavitch production), and the ingredients, while interesting and even at times somewhat exotic, are accessible in a good grocery store.

The video presents the preparation of a complete Shabbat (or holiday) meal, from challah, to gefilte fish or salmon a la sea breeze (a butterflied salmon stuffed with gefilte fish), 2 eggplant appetizers, chicken and cornish hen, kugels, cholent and several tantalizing-sounding desserts.

Interspersed with the cooking demonstrations are suggestions for making Shabbat dinner more festive, including wines, garnishes and a centrepiece of chocolate-dipped strawberries.

While some of the recipes are a little heavy in the cholesterol department (would we really want six eggs in the kugel, four in the fish and five in the cake? No matter how luscious they all sound?), Winner uses vegetables liberally and is not afraid to use spices, a cooking style she explains that she began to use in her years with her husband as Lubavitch emissaries in Argentina.

The recipes are demonstrated clearly, with precise instructions.

Her enthusiasm and humor is infectious. An elegant platter is shown off with exclamations of "Wow!" and "Isn't that great!" And who could object to her solemn declaration that "We all know Shabbos is spiritual — so calories don't count."

A Taste of Shabbos is probably not for the working wife. While she points out that it is not necessary to make all the recipes for each Shabbos, many of them take a great deal of time. Zesty marinated chicken, for instance, calls for a sauce that cooks for two hours, marinating the chicken overnight, stuffing it with a kishke stuffing, and finally cooking the dish for an hour and a half.

For those of us who barrel in the house two hours before candlelighting, it's a little impractical.

Nevertheless, it is hard not to get inspired by her enthusiasm and, especially, by how gosh-darn great everything looks at the end.

The video is infused with a substantial smattering of chassidic philosophy, but always in a gentle, appealing style.

A Taste of Shabbos is available from Chabad Lubavitch of West Brighton, P.O.B. 245491, Brooklyn, N.Y. 11224, or at some bookstores.

Food

Keeping recipes simple need not hurt desserts

Desserts don't have to be elaborate or super-rich to be appealing and delicious.

Herb Corn Bread

HERB CORN BREAD
(Makes 1 loaf)

3½ cups all-purpose flour
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
4 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. thyme leaves
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. garlic powder
⅓ cup cold butter or margarine
1 (14 oz. can) cream style corn
2 eggs, divided
2 tsp. rosemary leaves

Mix flour, sugar, baking powder, thyme, salt and garlic powder in food processor or large bowl. Cut in butter with food processor with on/off motion or by hand with pastry blender or two knives, until butter resembles coarse crumbs.

Combine corn and 1 egg in large bowl. Stir in flour mixture, just until dry ingredients are moistened. Turn out onto floured board; knead gently 10 times or until smooth.

Place on greased 15 x 10-inch baking pan. Roll with floured rolling pin to 12 x 6-inch oval. Cut two ¼-inch deep slashes down length of loaf. Beat lightly 1 egg; brush over loaf. Sprinkle rosemary on top.

Bake at 425F for 20 to 25 minutes or until golden brown. Remove from pan and cool on rack. Serve warm.

Hint: For light and flaky bread, use cold butter or margarine to cut in evenly.

ALGERIAN PUDDING
(Serves 6)

2 cups chopped dates
¾ cup sugar
1 cup chopped almonds
¾ cup chopped peanuts
4 egg whites

Beat whites until stiff. Mix together all remaining ingredients. Fold into the whites. Place into a well-buttered baking dish. Bake at 325 degrees for 35-40 minutes. May be served warm or cold.

Cookbook's recipes full of fun and flair

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

I'm always suspicious of cookbooks that call themselves "the best of." "The best" according to whom? Often this format seems to be just an excuse to pump out another version of a tired collection of recipes.

A welcome switch is Canadian Living's Best, a series of magazine-size, paperback cookbooks by well-known Canadian cookbook author Elizabeth Baird, the food writer of Canadian Living Magazine and the Canadian Living Test Kitchen (Ballantine Books, 1995).

Many of the recipes in the series were created especially for it, and show a flair and a sense of fun — not to mention good taste. The book is replete with colored photos of such good quality that even the spices seem to jump out at you.

The volumes sent for review were Vegetables, which will surely make the most ardent veggie-hater at least reconsider, and Easy Cooking, which manages the difficult feat of combining ease of preparation with lip-smacking appeal.

The treatment of vegetables has mercifully advanced from soggy boiled cabbage and lumpy potatoes. Vegetables tosses them with rice or pasta, adds interesting things to pizza (like potato, for instance), slices eggplants and rolls the slices up with a cheese and spice filling, glazes tomato slices with Dijon mustard and light mayonnaise and makes luscious salads with perky dressings.

True, not all the recipes in either book are kosher. Those that are not, however, can usually be easily adapted.

The chapters dealing with specific vegetables have a "close-up" feature, which gives suggestions for choosing, storing and preparing the produce, as well as nutritional information.

Notes beside each recipe suggests alternatives (Mustardy Brussels Sprouts, the book says, can be used for green beans as well) or accompaniments.

Easy Cooking will be especially welcome at High Holy Day time, when Jewish cooks are constantly looking for ideas that are simple to make, tasty, and different enough that your guests will go away wondering how you produced such a feast with your busy schedule.

Roasts are presented side-by-side with barbecue, fruit fools and salads and those much-needed meals for between-yontif suppers.

Spices are used imaginatively — coriander in white bean spread and pickles in that stand-by the tuna melt, for instance.

Here are just a few samples from this delightful series of cookbooks.

(From Easy Cooking)

SALMON AND POTATO STRATA

1 can (7½ oz) salmon
2 stalks celery, sliced
1 onion, chopped
4 eggs, lightly beaten
1⅓ cups milk
¾ tsp. each paprika and salt
½ tsp. each pepper and dried tarragon
4 potatoes, peeled and thinly sliced
½ cup dried bread crumbs
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley
2 tbsp. butter, cut into bits

In large bowl, mash salmon, juices and bones with fork. Stir in celery, onion, eggs, milk, paprika, ½ tsp. salt, pepper and tarragon until well mixed.

In greased 8-cup casserole, arrange half of the potatoes over bottom of dish; sprinkle with remaining salt. Pour salmon mixture over top; layer remaining potatoes over top.

Combine bread crumbs and parsley; sprinkle over potatoes. Dot with butter. Bake in 350 oven for 75 minutes or until potatoes are tender. Makes 4 servings.

GREEN BEAN SALAD WITH JULIENNE OF TURKEY

2 tbsp. kosher cider vinegar
1 tbsp. kosher olive oil
1 clove garlic, minced
1 tsp. kosher Dijon mustard'
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. cracked peppercorns
½ cup slivered red onion
1 lb. green beans
1 bay leaf
8 oz. cooked turkey, sliced
1 cup cherry tomatoes, quartered
red lettuce leaves
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

In large bowl, whisk together vinegar, oil, garlic, mustard, salt, sugar and peppercorns; add onion and toss well. Set aside.

In large pot of salted, boiling water, cook beans and bay leaf for 5 to 7 min., or until beans are tender-crisp. Drain and refresh under cold water, discarding bay leaf; drain again and pat dry. Add to bowl.

Cut turkey into strips; add to bowl along with tomatoes. Toss to coat well. Serve on lettuce-lined plates; garnish with parsley. Serves 4.

From Vegetables

MAPLE BRUSSELS SPROUTS WITH ONIONS

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, halved and sliced
1½ lb. brussels sprouts
2 tbsp. kosher maple syrup
salt and pepper

In large skillet, heat oil over medium-low heat; cook onion, stirring frequently, for about 20 minutes, or until tender and golden.

Add brussels sprouts and ¼ cup water; increase heat to high, cover and cook for 5 min.

Stir in maple syrup; cook, uncovered and stirring, for 5 to 10 min., or until liquid has evaporated and brussels sprouts are tender and coated. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Makes 4 servings.

*If kosher maple syrup is not available, substitute 1 tbsp. brown sugar.

Pride of Eight Generations
It has taken the Herzog Family over one hundred years to achieve world class recognition for kosher wines. Today, Baron Herzog varietals are awarded international gold medals, and recommended by America's most revered wine critics. This holiday season be sure to visit your local wine store and get to know Baron Herzog wines. It should take you only eight minutes to discover, what has taken us eight generations to perfect.

Nopalito sabra proves popular

By DANIEL ROGOV
Jerusalem Dateline

With their large flat pads, their thorny fruits and flowers that blossom annually, the sabra cactus is an inescapable and charming part of the Israeli landscape.

Since the sabra cactus, which is a member of the genus Opuntia, grows easily in the sandy and limestone soils of the country, and because the direction of its growth is easy to control, these sprawling cacti are planted by farmers as windbreakers and field dividers.

It surprises many to learn that even though there are 375 varieties of cactus that are native to the region in which Israel is located, the sabra is not one of them. The simple truth is that the sabra, with its large flat oval joints, barbed spines and edible fruits, was imported from New Mexico and Arizona to the Holy Land only in the 19th century.

Despite their more or less recent introduction to the land, the sabra cactus and its fruits are very much a part of the folklore of the nation.

For example, regional stereotypes compare the personality of native born Israelis with the fruits of these cacti. According to the image generated by this stereotype, both are tough and thorny on the outside but sweet and soft inside. Both the cactus fruits and native-born Israelis are known as "sabras."

The unique taste of the sabra fruits, which are also known as "prickly pears," is known to nearly everyone who has ever visited Israel. They are sold mainly by young boys with street side carts who clean and peel the fruits and hand them to you to eat straight away on the street.

As popular as they have been, their tough skins and sharp spines make them difficult to harvest and even more difficult to peel, so the fruits of the sabra have never become overly commercialized.

Agronomists and genetic engineers working at the Hebrew University Faculty of Agriculture at Rehovot started, several years ago, to explore the possibilities of developing a cactus fruit that would be free of sharp spikes. This particular plan has not yet come to fruition but the scientists have succeeded in adapting at least one type of Opuntia cactus so that it now produces spineless and edible pads.

Named "nopalitos," because of their similarity to the pads of certain closely related Mexican cacti, the pads are easy and painless to harvest and equally easy to peel. Whether fried and eaten like vegetables, or served as fruit-like ingredients to salads, nopalitos are rapidly becoming a part of the Israeli diet.

Tinned or fresh, Israeli-raised nopalitos are now being exported to several European, African and Asian nations. And, perhaps to close the circle completely, they may also be found on the shelves of supermarkets in Arizona and New Mexico. To prepare fresh nopalitos, simply soak them in water overnight. After the water has been discarded the nopalitos should be cut into long, thin pieces (there is no need to peel them), and are then ready to be mixed with lettuce, tomato and onion in a salad or for use in any of the recipes that follow.

Banana and Nopalito Soup

- 10 under-ripe bananas, in their skins
- 4 nopalitos, ready for cooking
- 1 tsp. powdered cinnamon
- ½ tsp. oregano
- ¼ tsp. crushed cloves
- ¼ cup butter or vegetable shortening
- ¼ cup olive oil
- 4 medium tomatoes, peeled and chopped
- 2 sweet green peppers, peeled and chopped coarsely
- 1 medium onion, chopped coarsely
- 1 tsp. salt

In a saucepan with 4 cups of water cook the bananas, in their skin, over a low flame, for 10 minutes. Remove the bananas, peel and mash them together with the nopalitos, cinnamon, oregano and cloves. Knead the mixture thoroughly, add a pinch of salt and let stand 5-10 minutes.

In a skillet heat the butter or shortening and fry the banana and nopalito mixture in this until lightly browned. Transfer the mixture to a deep serving dish and set aside to keep warm.

In a large skillet heat the olive oil and in this saute the tomatoes, peppers and onion until the onions are translucent. Add the salt, mix well and then pour the sauce over the banana and nopalito mixture. Serve hot. (Serves 6 - 8.)

Nutritious recipes feature lower fat, higher flavor

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Healthy eating does not necessarily have to mean boring eating.

Case in point — The Vitality Cookbook, by Monda Rosenberg and Frances Berkoff (Harper Collins, 1995).

The Canadian Cancer Society, in its introduction, explains that the recipes feature "lower-fat cooking, emphasize dark green and orange vegetables and orange fruits," a style of cooking that "promotes well-being and reduces the risk of developing health problems such as cancer, heart disease, diabetes and obesity."

Using triple-tested recipes from Chatelaine magazine, Rosenberg and Berkoff have managed to turn ingredients chock-full of nutrients into imaginative and appealing dishes. Sidebars offer suggestions for quick extras (What could be wrong with nectarine, plum and fresh mint salsa?) alternatives or short-cuts.

Nutrition information is helpful, especially in a cookbook whose main premise is, after all, good nutrition.

An introductory chapter gives suggestions for adding extra goodness to meals, from adding raisins to cereal, topping tuna salad or peanut butter with shredded carrots, to stocking your glove compartment with bags of dried apricots and small cans of vegetable juice.

Also included are lists of what vitamins and minerals are in different vegetables and fruits.

CARROT-BUTTERNUT SOUP WITH FRESH CORIANDER

1 butternut squash or small pumpkin, about 3 lbs.
2 large onions, coarsely chopped
1 tsp. kosher olive oil
6 to 8 cups chicken broth or bouillon
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. coriander (opt.)
1 tsp. curry powder
¼ to ½ tsp. cayenne pepper
6 carrots
1 cup uncooked red lentils or drained canned lentils (opt.)
1 cup orange juice
1 bunch fresh coriander (opt.)

To make squash or pumpkin easier to cut, make a small slash in skin with point of a sharp knife. Place whole squash in microwave and cook uncovered on high for 10 min.

Meanwhile, place onions, oil, 1 cup broth and seasonings in a large saucepan. Bring to a boil over medium heat and cook uncovered, stirring often, until onions are soft, about 10 min.

Peel carrots and slice into 1-inch pieces. Rinse lentils, if using. When onions are soft, stir in 5 cups broth, carrots, lentils and orange juice. Cover and bring to a boil.

Cut squash in half. Remove seeds and cut away peel. Cut pulp into 1½- inch pieces or, if soft enough, simply scoop out of skin. Stir pulp into soup. Cover, reduce heat and simmer, stirring often, until lentils and carrots are soft, about 20 to 35 min.

Puree soup in several batches in a food procesor or blender, until smooth. If thicker than you like, thin with broth, stirring in no more than a ½ cup soup just before serving.

Covered and refrigerated this soup will keep well for several days and also freezes well.

ELEGANT EASY-AS-APPLE PIE

½ pkg kosher frozen puff pastry dough, thawed
6 to 8 apples
½ to ¾ cup sugar
1 cup dried apricots
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 tbsp. cornstarch
1 tbsp. milk (or non-dairy creamer)
1 tbsp. sugar

Preheat oven to 475. Sprinkle counter with flour and lay pastry on top. Dust rolling pin with flour. Roll pastry into a thin circle, at least 14 to 16 inches across. Don't worry if edges are very uneven. Fold pastry in half and lift into a 9 in. pie plate. Unfold pastry. It will hang over sides of dish and onto counter. Using your fingers, gently press pastry against bottom edges of pie plate.

Peel, core and very thinly slice apples, about 1/8 in. thick. You should have about 8 cups. Slice apricots into thin strips. Place apples and apricots in a bowl. If apples taste sweet, use ½ cup sugar; if apples are tart, use ¾ cup sugar. Stir sugar with cinnamon and cornstarch until evenly blended. Sprinkle over fruit and gently mix until evenly coated.

Turn fruit into pie plate and pour any juices over top. Gently press down and smooth top. Fold pastry over apples, overlapping edges as needed. Centre of pie will not be covered with pastry and edges will be uneven.

Brush top of pastry with milk, then sprinkle with 1 tbsp. sugar. Place pie on lowest rack of oven. Immediately turn temperature down to 350 and bake until apples are tender when pierced with tines of fork and pastry is golden, about 45 to 55 min.

Place hot pie on a rack, and let cook until lukewarm before cutting.

A lighter supper

Keep the feeling of summer through the holidays with these light supper ideas from the Ontario Berry Growers Association.

MEXICAN STYLE LAYERED BERRY SALAD
(Serves 4)

This salad can be served as an appetizer or as 4 individual salads.

2 cups crushed kosher tortilla chips
1 tbsp. lemon or lime juice
2 ripe avocados, peeled, mashed
2½ cups shredded lettuce
1 cup sour cream or yogurt
2½ cups sliced strawberries or raspberries
¾ cup grated kosher Cheddar cheese

Place tortilla chips in bottom of casserole or pie plate.

Add lemon juice to mashed avocados.

Top chips with lettuce, sour cream or yogurt, avocados, fresh berries and cheese. Serve cold with added chips.

Vancouver family donates four Torahs to shuls

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Four emerging congregations organized recently in the Lower Mainland (Greater Vancouver area) will have brand new Torahs for the High Holy Days, the gifts of community leaders Morris and Dena Wosk and family.

Although the Wosks have long been members of the Orthodox Schara Tzedeck Synagogue, they did not reserve their gifts for Orthodox congregations. The recipients will be White Rock/South Surrey Jewish Community Centre; Burquest Jewish Community, which holds Traditional services once a month; Or Shalom, Traditional Egalitarian; and Shaarey Tefillah, Traditional.

In a letter to Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, Wosk wrote, "We are witnessing an historic time in the growth of the Jewish community of Greater Vancouver and we deem it an honor, a privilege and a responsibility to share in the maturation of the children of Israel in our midst."

The Wosks expressed the hope that the new Torahs will serve as a catalyst for continued growth, learning and prosperity in the area's Jewish communities.

"We wish your congregation much success and naches in years ahead," said a letter to the presidents of the shuls.

Wosk told The CJN that in buying the Torahs, he enlisted the help of Rabbi Bernard Goldenberg, a former rabbi of Schara Tzedeck, who now resides in Israel.

"We visited Mea Shearim in Jerusalem and met with one of the most highly recommended scribes, and after studying the various calligraphic scripts available, we placed an order for four new Torahs," he explained.

While he had the option of buying pre-owned Torahs at a reduced price, he said, "I wanted to be sure the congregations would receive a scroll written with the particular congregation in mind and that it would serve the community for many years in pristine condition."

Each Torah will have inlaid silver handles, a velvet mantel and a solid sterling silver crown.

One Torah has already been delivered to Vancouver and the others are expected shortly.

"The scribe assured me that the work is at an advanced stage of progress," Wosk said.

Campaign launched

VANCOUVER — A husband and wife team, Arnie and Susan Fine, are co-chairs of the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign, which got underway last week. Women's Division's chair is Gerri London.

Toronto's Judy Feld Carr, who helped spearhead the rescue of Syrian Jewry, was on hand to get the campaign going, speaking to a women's special gifts dinner and a men's special gifts luncheon.

The campaign, operated by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, will be different this year in that donors will be able to designate how parts of their gifts are allocated.

Under a 50-50 Plus Giving plan, donors can give half of their increase over last year's gift to a local agency of their choice.

It's believed Vancouver's is the first federation to try the new approach.

BLOOMSBURY cafe

Bloomsbury Cafe... one of Toronto's most beautiful & affordable restaurants is happy to announce that our expansion is complete and we have added 120 new seats. With a total of 320 seats, this should help greatly in reducing the large line-ups we have had since opening day.

When home isn't home for the holidays

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — September marks the beginning of a new year. Like many university-bound students, I will be leaving my parents' home.

Thousands of students will be moving into dorm rooms as I did last year when I was a frosh at the University of King's College in Halifax.

But this year, many other returning students like myself will have housewarming parties in our own apartments that we are sharing with the friends we made last year.

The Hebrew month of Tishrei almost always coincides with the month of September.

And this means the coming of the Jewish New Year — Rosh Hashanah. After the shofar is sounded, families get together and share their resolutions as they celebrate their wish for a sweet New Year over apples, bread and honey.

Jewish university students living in cities that are distant from their families will share their resolutions with friends instead — not only with their Jewish friends, but also with friends who, while they are not Jewish, are interested in learning more about Jewish customs and festivals.

This time last year, when I left for Nova Scotia, my anxieties for the beginning of a new year were compounded. I was not only setting out to a university where I knew nobody, but I was also going to spend Rosh Hashanah in a city where the only person with whom I had even a slight acquaintance was a friend of my sister.

I knew that Halifax was not Toronto and the Jewish communities could hardly be compared. After all, in an immediate quarter-mile radius of my home in Toronto, there are at least six synagogues capable of seating thousands of congregants. In the whole of Halifax, there are only two shuls, the Beth Israel and the Shaar Shalom.

The Beth Tzedec just up the road from where I live, has more congregants than both these shuls combined.

A CHAT alumnus, I was on my way to being alone in the middle of the Maritimes. And I was apprehensive.

For my friends at larger universities with substantial Jewish enrolments, there was no need to worry about with whom they would share the chagim (holidays).

But at a university where fewer than 20 of the 700 students are Jewish, I had my doubts. There is no Hillel House in Halifax and until I actually got there, I had not heard of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student's Federation (APJSF) that is active on the Dalhousie campus, which adjoins King's.

What I found was that Halifax does not really need a Hillel House. Instead, it has a warm and friendly Jewish community, whose homes are always open to the Jewish students.

There is no need to worry about being without family on chagim. On the contrary, you will find it difficult to leave shul without an invitation to someone's dinner table. And if for some reason you are overlooked, the APJSF will help you find a family.

The Halifax Jewish community, like other smaller communities, helps make the Jewish student's initiation into a new place much easier.

While my immediate family celebrates Rosh Hashanah in the Toronto community, I know that I can relax and celebrate with my new Jewish community in Halifax. I have no more anxiety about feeling left out.

The first time I went to shul in Halifax on Rosh Hashanah morning, I set off with the uneasy feeling that I might be turned away. I had not bought a ticket for a seat.

I rehearsed the story about my ticketless condition to the officer who would surely be presiding over the entry to the synagogue.

When I got to the Beth Israel, it was explained to me that there are always seats left over for out-of-town students. I was happily surprised and knew that I was going to have a good year.

Shanah tovah.

Welcome the New Year
in a warm, friendly setting.

Extending Images through The CJN

By RINAT GREENBERG and JESSICA PELT
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Welcome to the first-ever Campus News and Views page. It is with great pleasure that Images has coordinated this page with The Canadian Jewish News.

Images is an independent newspaper produced for and by Jewish students on campuses in Toronto.

Many changes are being made to the campus paper, noticeably the physical size, the scope of articles and increased distribution. In addition, the Images office is now located with Jewish Campus Services.

The Jewish Campuses theme around the world this year is Make It Yours. Images is proud to fully support that theme and the works of Jewish Campus Services. The theme has been an inherent part of Images since the paper's founding and remains the focus of the paper.

Through the monthly Campus News and Views page, Images hopes to extend its reach to Jewish students across Canada. The purpose of the page is to connect students and campus activities across the country. Students are invited to submit News and Views items and thus link themselves and their campuses to others.

In addition, all students are encouraged to write for Images. Although the paper is currently centred in Toronto, it is looking to expand, in an effort to fulfil the motto of Make It Yours. All topics, issues and genres are welcome and will be considered for publication.

It is the aim of Images to cover a variety of topics, to try and reach a majority of Jewish students.

Beginning Sept. 14, the paper will be published monthly and will be available on campuses throughout the city.

Submissions can be sent to Images, c/o Jewish Campus Services, 40 Sheppard Ave. W., Suite 707, Toronto, M5N 6K9, or to Rinat by e-mail at yu119083@yorku.ca.

For more information, call 416-512-0814.

Images, its editors, writers, producers and support staff wish the entire community a Shanah Tovah and to all the students, good luck in school.

— York University student Rinat Greenberg and University of Toronto student Jessica Pelt are the co-editors of Images.

Students explore meaning of Jewish leadership

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Over 250 university and college students representing more than 115 campuses arrived at Camp Moshava in Honesdale, Pa. on August 23, for the seventh annual Hillel International Leaders' Assembly.

The students, active members of Hillels, represented universities and colleges in the United States, Canada and for the first time, the former Soviet Union, where this past year a Hillel was developed at the Moscow University.

All arrived enthusiastic about the next four days.

"The purpose of the Leaders' Assembly," said Amy Bebchick, conference coordinator, "is to bring together Jewish student leaders from all over to share ideas on leadership, so that these leaders may return to their campuses and strengthen the involvement of other Jewish students in Hillel and their communities."

The conference offered guest speakers, leadership labs and text study sessions to explore the meaning of Jewish leadership.

Organization development consultant Nancy Ferst spoke on Learning and Leading: Developing Your Leadership Style. She helped the students to evaluate their own leadership qualities and determine what type of leader each one is.

Edgar Bronfman spoke about the change in the Jewish community as a whole, or, as he termed it, the Jewish Renaissance.

He also remained for the leadership labs the next morning.

The leadership labs, led by members of the conference staff, focused on topics such as Meaningful Jewish Programming, Conflict Management and Stress Control.

Students attended two sessions, listening and then discussing the topic, comparing it with real scenarios from campus life.

Text study sessions allowed the students to focus on Jewish themes, choosing from sessions such as Shabbat as a Mystical Experience and Women in Talmud. Besides getting to know each other through study, many were exposed to new ways of thinking about various Jewish topics.

As Jonathan Friedman, from the University of Toronto put it, "The conference was a terrific opportunity to spend four days just being Jewish."

The assembly also offered religious services, a learners' service and a Rosh Chodesh women's group, all mainly student run. The moving Kabbalat Shabbat services set the tone for the weekend.

Other activities included a Program Shuk, where student participants held 20-minute sessions focusing on successful events held at their Hillels in the past year, with the goal of sharing new ideas to bring back to their respective campuses.

A program titled Partner Agency Lunch and Shuk brought together 26 partner agencies from the Jewish community, who spent the lunch hour providing information on their various objectives and allowing the students one-on-one conversations to answer specific questions.

Through all of the exhausting sessions with overwhelming amounts of information, the assembly proved that the students' spirit was heightened by the experience. Dinners were followed by rounds of song, which turned into spontaneous dancing, at times lasting over half an hour.

A talent show titled Saturday Night Live showcased student enthusiasm in song, music, dance and skit and the final program, a candle-lit kumsitz, brought all participants together for two hours of non-stop song.

Shai Spetgang, from York University said, "The conference allowed me to recharge my batteries for the coming year."

Sidura Ludwig was one of 11 Toronto students who attended the Hillel Leadership Assembly under the auspices of the Central Campus Services Agency.

1,000 Israeli reservists refuse to uproot settlers

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Some 1,000 reserve soldiers have signed a document stating they will not obey orders to uproot Jewish settlements, Col. (res.) Moshe Leshem, one of the heads of an organization fighting the Oslo accord, said last Wednesday.

The document was sent to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Leshem, of the Action Committee for the Abolition of the Autonomy Plan, said about a third of the document's signatories hold the rank of staff-sergeant and higher.

He said the signatures include the person's army ID number, home address and telephone number.

Leshem said the group will embark on a nationwide campaign to get more than 20,000 other signatures.

"The purpose," he explained, "is to let the government know that it will not have the soldiers needed to uproot Jews."

The document reads: "Uprooting settlements and Jewish residents by the IDF is inhuman, anti-Zionist, and runs contrary to my conscience as a person, citizen and Jew. As such, I am honored to inform you that if you give me an order to do this, I will not carry it out. I am convinced that such an order is completely illegal."

Said Leshem: "The Oslo process is leading us in the opposite direction of all my Zionist beliefs. My belief is that where you plant a tree, where you clear a rock, that is your land. I oppose the Oslo process. I will not carry out such an order, and will try to influence those under me."

He said that for "technical" reasons, the petition was circulated mainly among reservists.

Col. (res.) Shlomo Baum, another committee member, said the organization will soon open "recruitment centres" for a project called Israel Responsible One for Another.

Its purpose, he said, is to recruit volunteers to resist the uprooting of settlements and to staff armed patrols on roads in the territories when the IDF redeploys.

"We will oppose force with force, but not with weapons," Baum said. "It is inconceivable that any government will use guns against Jews. If they come to pull us out by hand, we will fight by hand, and if they come with clubs, we will fight with clubs."

Terror's toll

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Eighty-three Israelis were killed in terror attacks over the past year, while one Palestinian died at the hands of Israeli civilians, the group Peace Watch reported last Sunday.

According to Peace Watch, the number of Israelis killed in terror attacks rose by 73 per cent over the previous two years.

There have been 149 Israelis killed in terror attacks since the agreement — 66 the first year and 83 the second, compared to 86 in the two years prior to it.

The report shows a sharp drop in the number of Palestinians killed in clashes with Israeli security forces. From October 1993 to August 1995, 159 Palestinians were killed in clashes, while from October 1991 to October 1993, the number stood at 264.

Peace Watch found that the number of lethal attacks on Jews decreased last year, from 44 in 1993-94 to 20 in 1994-95. The reason for the larger number of fatalities is the more lethal nature of suicide bombings, which increased this past year, the group explained.

According to the organization, Hamas was responsible for 85 of the murders since the agreement, and Fatah for eight.

One Palestinian was killed in unprovoked attacks last year, compared to 38 the year before (including the Hebron massacre in which settler Baruch Goldstein killed 29); seven in 1992-1993; and none the year before that.

The organization's figures show a dramatic drop in violent acts in Gaza over the last four years: from 1,091 between October 1991 and October 1992, to 84 from October 1994 to August 1995. Peace Watch attributed that to a sharp decrease in Gaza of a Jewish presence.

During the same period, violent acts in Judea and Samaria dropped from 1,535 to 422.

Israel, U.S.A. & the World

Oslo accord ushered in a new era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Two years after it burst upon a stunned world, the Oslo accord is a mixed bag of accomplishments and disappointments.

The historic agreement signed by Israel and the PLO, ratified in Washington on Sept. 13, 1993, has launched the makings of a historic peace process that could ultimately transform the Middle East.

But Oslo, the culmination of a year of secret diplomacy, has also triggered a fierce backlash. There has been a spate of Palestinian terrorism, as well as a sporadic campaign of civil disobedience by Jewish settlers and their right-wing supporters.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

The Oslo talks produced a Declaration of Principles (DoP) outlining an ambitious blueprint for peaceful coexistence. It provides for Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank (a pilot project of sorts is currently under way in parts of Gaza and the town of Jericho). It calls for an eventual Israeli evacuation from the territories, populated by about 130,000 Jews and two million Arabs.

But the crucial make-or-break details — security arrangements, the depth of an Israeli withdrawal, the status of the Jewish settlements and of Jerusalem, water rights, Palestinian refugees — have yet to be resolved. These devilishly difficult issues are supposed to be addressed at final status talks due to start in 1996.

In the meantime, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators are working to complete the second phase of Oslo, which has fallen more than a year behind schedule.

One of the reasons for the delay is terrorism. In a bid to derail Oslo and to discredit the leadership of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, Palestinian rejectionists, mainly Islamic radicals from Hamas and Islamic Jihad, have perpetrated a series of gory suicide bombings, which have killed and maimed numerous Israelis.

These random acts of violence have dispirited Israelis, divided the country, jolted Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's Labor government and emboldened Jewish rightists who regard the West Bank as a sacred trust and/or a strategic asset. Nevertheless, the majority of Israelis still support the architecture of peace as envisaged in Norway and see no viable alternative to Oslo.

The sickening succession of bombings has increased Israeli pressure on the Palestine National Authority (PNA) in Gaza and Jericho to crack down on the terrorists. Slow off the mark, the PNA has only begun to do this. Has Arafat finally realized that there is a direct correlation between the virtual suppression of terrorism and the attainment of Palestinian autonomy?

As expected, the spinoff effects of Olso have been of immense benefit to Israel.

Thanks to Israel's rapprochement with the PLO, King Hussein of Jordan entered into a full-blown peace treaty with Israel last October. Jordan thus joined Egypt in ending its state of war with Israel.

The spirit of Oslo has had an impact elsewhere in the Middle East: Morocco and Tunisia have established low-level diplomatic relations with Israel, and the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) — Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates — has abolished the secondary and tertiary economic boycott against Israel.

Israel, too, has forged informal links with at least two GCC members — Oman (which Rabin has visited) and Qatar (which has expressed an interest in shipping gas to Europe via Israel).

Lastly, the new era ushered in by the DoP has enabled Israel to open or reopen diplomatic ties with more than 20 countries, the majority in Asia and Africa, where lucrative markets beckon.

TRADITIONAL CONSERVATIVE SYNAGOGUE of 300 families in Toronto-Canada is seeking an energetic, enthusiastic rabbi. Must be a dynamic leader & have organizational skills to initiate and establish religious, educational and social programs for the entire family. Position available by Chanukah 1995.

EL AL ISRAEL AIRLINES

The Airline of Israel

Sept. 4

• Ha'aretz reported that Israel will ask Russia for details of its agreement to sell nuclear reactors to Iran. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is expected to focus on the issue when he meets this week with Russian Prime Minister Victor Chernomyrdin. Chernomyrdin has reportedly sent a letter to Rabin saying the arrangement would not endanger Israel.

Sept. 5

• Davar reported Israel will propose to the Palestinian Authority that the IDF remain responsible for security throughout Hebron. According to the report, Israel will call for an extensive IDF presence in the city during the interim stage and will reject the Palestinian demand that the IDF remain only in Jewish neighborhoods.

Sept. 6

• Speaking in the Knesset, Rabin said the peace process with the Palestinians will be stopped if the PLO covenant is not amended within two months of elections in the West Bank. He also reiterated that Palestinians who are in Israeli jails for murder will not be part of a prisoner release; nor will Jewish settlements be evacuated.

• Justice Minister David Libai submitted requests to the Palestinian Authority for the extradition of seven Palestinians suspected of having killed Israelis.

Sept. 7

• Talks between Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat concluded in Taba. Ha'aretz reported that progess had been made on the issue of sharing water. The Palestinians agreed to the Israeli proposal to double the current West Bank water quota over the next five years, with 20 per cent of the increase to be supplied within the first year. The two sides could not agree on the subject of Hebron. "There is still a significant gap that is difficult to bridge," Peres said.

• Ha'aretz reported that, according to a senior IDF officer, there is a significant decrease in Hamas' popularity in the Gaza Strip.

Sept. 8

• Yediot Aharanot reported that Japanese Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama will arrive this week for a historic two-day visit, the first ever by a Prime Minister of Japan to Israel. Murayama will begin his tour in Saudi Arabia and will also visit Egypt, Jordan and Syria.

Israel, U.S.A. & the World

Rabin's Jerusalem 3000 message

Mr. Speaker, Mayor of Jerusalem, sons and daughters of Jerusalem:

Jewish legend tells us that at the moment that King David was about to dig the foundation of the Holy Temple, the groundwaters rose and threatened to flood and destroy Jerusalem, the land of Israel and the entire world.

The legend goes that King David then rose and cast into the turbulent waters a shard on which the ineffable name of God was written — and the waters immediately receded. The people of Israel were assured of safety in their land and on their soil.

If it were only possible to repeat that feat, I would write on that shard two words of love to Jerusalem, to the land of Israel. One word — tolerance; the other — peace.

Sons and daughters of Jerusalem, I am a Jerusalemite.

I was born in Sharei Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem. In Jerusalem, I was a partner as a soldier and a commander in the bitter battles of the War of Independence. In Jerusalem, I saw my friends and my soldiers lose their lives facing the walls that fell to the Arab Legion.

I had the great privilege to be in command in Jerusalem during the Jewish people's finest hour when, during the Six Day War, the Temple Mount was liberated. In Jerusalem today, we are now carrying out the battle for peace.

Yes, I am a Jerusalemite.

Three thousand years of history look down upon us today, here in the city whose streets were trampled by Greek phalanxes, whose pavements were trodden on by Roman legions whose catapults tried to breach its walls, whose inhabitants were vanquished by the Crusaders, here where Turkish cavalry galloped through the streets and where British officers peered out from their forts.

Three thousand years of history look down upon us today, in the city from whose stones the ancient Jewish nation sprang, from whose clear mountain air three religions absorbed their spiritual essence and their strength. Jerusalem — to which every believing Jew turns three times a day in the prayer, "May our eyes behold Your return to Zion in mercy."

Three thousand years of history look down upon us today, in the city where the Jewish priestly blessing mingles with the calls of the Muslim muezzins and the bells of the Christian churches, where, in every alley and in every house, the admonitions of the Prophets were heard; in the city whose towers saw nations rise, whose towers saw nations fall — and Jerusalem stands forever.

Three thousand years of history look down upon us today, as do the dreams which cover the hyssop of the Western Wall and the silent graves of the Mount of Olives and Mount Herzl, the hush of the footsteps of the pilgrims and the thunder of the nailed boots of the ruthless conquerors, the walls which resonate with the prayers of the children and the pleas of the praying, the exultation of victory which mingled with the tears of the paratroopers next to the remnants of the Temple liberated from the yoke of strangers.

Three thousand years of dream and prayer today wrap Jerusalem in love and bring close Jews of every generation — from the fires of the Inquisition to the ovens of Auschwitz, and from all corners of the earth — from Yemen to Poland.

Three thousand years of Jerusalem are for us, now and forever, a message of tolerance between religions, of love between peoples, of understanding between the nations, of the penetrating awareness that there is no State of Israel without Jerusalem and no peace without Jerusalem united — the City of Peace.

On the day that the government offices were moved to Jerusalem, on December 13, 1949, the first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, said, "The State of Israel has, and will have, only one capital, eternal Jerusalem. So it was 3,000 years ago, and so it will be, as we believe for eternity."

United Jerusalem is the heart of the Jewish people and the capital of the State of Israel. United Jerusalem is ours. Jerusalem forever!

Bomb explodes at Jewish school

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LYONS — France has heightened security nationwide in the wake of a car bomb that exploded outside Lyons' largest Jewish school last week.

Across France, "more precautions" are being taken at buildings and schools, both Jewish and non-Jewish, as a result of the blast in the Lyons suburb of Villeurbanne, Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary general of the European Jewish Congress, said in an interview from his home in Paris.

The blast occurred last Thursday, just minutes before the 700 pupils at the school were to be dismissed at 5 p.m., Cwajgenbaum said.

It injured at least 14 people, one of them seriously. Two parents waiting for their children outside the school, along with two owners of nearby shops, were among the injured.

Six people were hospitalized and three children suffered smoke inhalation.

Because the school clock was apparently running a few minutes late, the students had not left the school when the bomb went off.

The gas bomb, consisting of an explosive mixture placed in a canister filled with nails and bolts, was similar to those used in five previous bombings and attempted bombings in France since late July.

Four of those bombs exploded on the streets of Paris and in the city's Metro. The fifth was an unexploded bomb found near Lyons.

No group immediately claimed responsibility for Thursday's bombing, but police suspected Algerian Muslim extremists who have threatened France for backing the military government in Algeria.

More than 30,000 people have been killed in Algeria in clashes between security forces and Islamic militants since January 1992, when the army cancelled national elections that the Islamic Salvation Front was poised to win.

French police reportedly detained for questioning a man who was seen running from the site of the attack before the bomb went off.

While the other attacks in France appeared aimed at creating terror in French society as a whole, this was the first attack targeting the French Jewish community.

The bomb outside the Jewish school shattered classroom windows, leaving glass shards in some of the children's hair, according to reports. Students and teachers dove to the classroom floors for cover.

Cwajgenbaum said he had "no doubt" that the targeting of a Jewish school was tied to the recent bomb attacks and that by targeting a Jewish school, the perpetrators were seeking increased publicity.

Some 50,000 Jews live in Lyons, making it the third largest Jewish community in France, Cwajgenbaum said.

Police arrest stabbing suspect

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israeli security forces have arrested a man believed responsible for last Tuesday's stabbing of a Jewish family in the West Bank.

The assailant was identified last week as Hamadalleh Abdel Hadi Abdel Aziz, 20.

The suspect has a criminal background and fingerprints were found linking him to the attack, an Israel Defence Force statement said.

Aziz is believed responsible for the stabbing death of British immigrant Daniel Frei, 28, and the wounding of his wife, Mara, 29, in the Sept. 5 early morning attack at the family's home in the settlement of Ma'aleh Michmas, near Ramallah north of Jerusalem.

The couple's 18-month-old daughter, Rachel, who was sleeping in the house at the time of the attack, was unharmed.

Doctors at Hadassah Hospital said last Wednesday that Mara Frei's condition had improved significantly.

She was moved from the intensive care unit after undergoing surgery for multiple stab wounds to her lung, liver and arm.

Frei, who was three months pregnant, lost the baby as a result of the attack.

Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau visited her in the hospital and offered prayers for a speedy recovery.

Security forces said Aziz was believed to have collaborated in the past with Israeli authorities. A motive for the attack was being investigated.

Israel Radio reported that the stabbings might have been motivated by the alleged killer's desire to prove he was not an Israeli informer.

Last Tuesday, an anonymous caller phoned a news agency in Jerusalem and claimed responsibility for the attack in the name of George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP).

"This operation is our reply to the arrest a week ago of three of our activists in Ramallah and the continued detention by the forces of occupation of Mustafa Katamish," the caller reportedly said.

Katamish, a member of the PFLP politburo, has been in an Israeli jail for the past three years.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said he is not certain the attack was related to the peace process.

"There was terror before the peace and if there won't be peace there will be more terror. It happened in an area which is under our responsibility," he said in an interview with Israel Radio.

Questions raised about Canadian non-participation

According to Rodney Moore, a Foreign Affairs spokesperson in Ottawa, Canada has "no formal position on [participating] at any level in any festivities."

Foreign Affairs received "a number of calls" asking about Canada's absence, Moore admitted. And everyone who called was told simply that Berger wasn't present because he had not received an invitation, "and any other questions on this sort of thing were really hypothetical."

Eli Yerushalami, the chargé d'affaires at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa tells another story. He says that as far as he knows, Berger was invited.

"You say that Foreign Affairs says he wasn't invited?" asked an incredulous Yerushalami. "That's the first I've heard of that. All the ambassadors were invited. It's hard for me to believe that he wasn't.

"From our point of view, we think every ambassador should have been there. It's the birthday of a city, a city that although we won't give it up, is a city that is not just Jewish but is for Christian and Muslim.

"It's not a political event," Yerushalami said. "It's for everyone to take part in."

He added that although Jerusalem 3000 was a national celebration, the city of Jerusalem was organizing the festivities.

They wanted as many diplomats attending as possible. It just wouldn't make sense to deliberately leave out Canada, one of the friendliest nations towards Israel.

The festival, the brainchild of former Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek, was initiated long before the signing of the Oslo accord, which calls for negotiations on the city's permanent status to begin next year.

Upon assuming the mayor's job, Olmert also took over the reins of the festival. The mayor dismisses claims that the event has become politicized and accuses the Europeans of introducing a political element into what is essentially a cultural festival.

He noted that the program pays homage to the importance of Jerusalem to Christians and Muslims, as well as Jews. But Olmert does not hide his view that Jerusalem is Israel's capital alone and that its importance for the rest of the world lies in its religious significance, not its political centrality.

He has repeatedly called on Jews of the world to congregate in Jerusalem this year, to demonstrate the Jewish connection to the city.

"We are opening our celebrations here, in the original City of David, to tell ourselves and the entire world that our roots in this land predate Zionism, predate the Diaspora and even predate the Holy Temples," said Olmert at last week's gala opening.

Kollek has criticized the handling of the festival, calling it "a missed opportunity ... to strengthen our position in the world."

The trimillennium could have been a historic landmark — a step toward peace and recognition of our sovereignty — instead of just a good show," he wrote in a newspaper column last week.

The former mayor accused organizers of preferring noisy declarations to quiet, behind-the-scenes work, a policy that convinced other countries the festival was "something they are better off avoiding."

Anti-Israel rhetoric absent at UN conference

"I've had great conversations with women from Tunisia and had a debate with a Kuwaiti woman over reproductive rights. We had discussions with Jordanian women. Some at the Arab tent didn't want to talk to us, but that's the exception, not the rule," Price said.

She and others cited movement in the Middle East peace process as the foundation for the relatively comfortable dynamic between Arab and Jewish delegates.

Although there was criticism of Israel at some of the 300 workshops held each day at the NGO forum, held in Huairou, a town 50 kilometres north of Beijing, "it certainly isn't the issue it was before," said Marlene Post, national U.S. president of Hadassah.

"We were prepared to defend Israel on a variety of issues but the rhetoric has been limited," she said.

In one workshop where Israel was attacked, the moderator repeatedly urged the Palestinian panelist to "have civility," and succeeded in preventing the rhetoric from exploding into the torrent that fueled anger at earlier conferences, said Price.

"There have been negative things said about almost every country, including the United States. This is a dramatically different atmosphere" from conferences past.

In addition, "the Palestinian women aren't a united front" with a coordinated strategy for enlisting other Arab and Muslim delegates' help in attacking Israel, as they did at each of the previous three conferences, said Price.

Anti-Semitism permeated UN women's conferences in Mexico City in 1975, where Zionism was equated with racism for the first time in any international forum, as well as in Copenhagen in 1980 and in Nairobi in 1985.

Jewish delegates came together several times in Huairou and Beijing during the NGO forum, Lieberman said.

Some 80 Jewish women from North America, Israel, Europe, South America, South Africa and Australia met on the opening day of the conference to introduce themselves and talk about the issues they consider a priority.

Youth, aging, health care

Topics they raised included youth, aging and health care, Lieberman said.

Jewish delegates met again two days later to report back on what they had heard at workshops. They were joined afterwards by 15 Jewish residents of the Chinese capital — all of them American and European expatriates in the business community — who hosted Shabbat services and dinner for members of the caucus.

Last Tuesday, a smaller group of Jewish delegates to the NGO forum and the official government conference met to discuss what had transpired in the workshops about the Middle East.

"People who had been at Nairobi said they didn't think it was anything like it was in the past," said Lieberman.

Jewish attendees, who may total as many as 200 according to delegates, are a tiny fraction of the estimated 40,000 people who attended one or both of the international gatherings.

But Jewish women have particular experience and expertise to contribute to the women at the conference, the majority of whom are from developing nations, said Beth Wohlgelernter, U.S. Hadassah's executive director.

"We have a lot of experience organizing at the grassroots level and on issues of education and health care," she said.

And though unanimously greeted with relief by Jewish delegates, the shift from the extreme stress of being the focus of international conflict at past conferences requires a shift in internal focus, they said.

"There are so many other issues out there that we're no longer that interesting," said Hadassah's Post.

"Do we miss the spotlight? No, no," she said, laughing.

Naomi Chazan, a member of Israel's Knesset and part of that country's delegation to the UN conference, told Jewish delegates that what happened in Beijing between Jewish, Israeli, Palestinian and Muslim women "is a revolution."

"We have to get used to not being in the centre of attention," she added.

Power-hitter gets scholarship to NCAA school

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jason Gold has to be feeling pretty good about himself as he gets ready for another year playing U.S. college baseball.

Last year, the power-hitting native of Toronto attended Sauk Valley Community College, a good team in the National Junior Collegiate Athletic Association. There he got to play opponents from schools like Joliet and Triton (Kirby Puckett's alma mater) and was scouted by major league teams.

But this year he's set his sights a little higher. He's turned down several offers for a full scholarship at other Division 2 schools and accepted a three-quarter scholarship to Drexel University, an NCAA Division 1 school in Philadelphia.

Gold believes he has the best chance of improving his baseball skills and getting noticed by pro scouts if he attends a Division 1 school.

"This is the top league," he said, prior to heading south for the season. "It doesn't get any better than this. It's more competitive. I'll have a better chance of being drafted."

Gold, 21, has been playing baseball since Moses was a boy and like many others (with less talent), he dreams of playing in the majors.

"My dad [Allan] really loves baseball. He taught me all I know about the game. I've been playing it all my life. That's all I do. I watch it, I eat it, I sleep it," he said.

Last year, in 36 games for Sauk, Gold hit .328, including seven home runs, 34 RBIs, 10 doubles and three triples. The freshman third baseman led the team in ribbies, homers and doubles.

Over the summer, he played for North York in Toronto's top senior league where he hit .448 and led the team with 12 home runs. A six-foot-two, 205-pound power hitter who likes to go for the fence, he also hit three triples and 10 doubles.

In previous years Gold played juvenile baseball for Thornhill Reds in the Leaside Junior League and in 1988 and '90, he was on two Toronto gold medal winning teams at the Maccabi Youth Games in Chicago and Detroit, captaining the '90 squad.

Gold has seen his game improve from year to year; so he believes he still has a chance to realize his dream and get drafted by a major league team, even though he was passed over in his first year of eligibility.

"I'm only 21. I still have a pretty good shot," he said.

"I'm a lot more patient at the plate," he continued. "I'm a fastball hitter, but I hit the offspeed pitch and curve much better than I used to. That'll help me a lot, because a lot of the guys [in college] change their speed and have good control."

Gold has already been told he's likely going to start at first base and hit in the middle of the lineup, around fourth or fifth.

When he's not studying the fine art of hitting curve balls, Gold will hit the books in his chosen field of study, sociology.

Jason Gold swings for the fences

Israeli soccer squad wins Maccabi tourney

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Soccer, as everyone knows, is Israel's national sport.

That became even clearer this summer, when an Israeli soccer team visited Montreal and won what was described as the first ever Maccabi International Soccer Tournament.

The polite members of the Israeli soccer squad from the Amal School in Petach Tikvah, coached by David Spivak, had been to Montreal last year for an exhibition match.

But the team's politesse only went so far. The players weren't the least bit reluctant about beating the Golani Montreal team, coached by Iftach Levi, 4-3 in the second, final round on the Wagar High School playing field.

The losers of the first round, Maccabi Cote St. Luc (which had lost to Golani in an exciting overtime shootout) and Maccabi Oldtimers (which had gone down 3-1 to the Israeli Amal team), met for the consolation game, which the Oldtimers won 3-2.

All in all, an exciting, energetic tournament, said one of the organizers, Leon Elfassi.

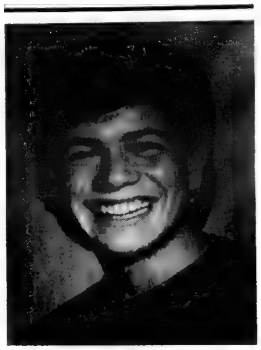
Israel's consul general in Montreal Daniel Gal came by despite drizzly weather, to hand the plaque to the victors.

"We plan to have the tournament every year," Elfassi said, even if the higher calibre of the Israeli squad made the outcome predictable.

"Some of the Israeli players," Elfassi noted, "are on the junior national team."

Still, for Elfassi, who works as a fitness consultant and coached the Maccabi CSL team, and for the sponsoring organization, Maccabi Canada, the tourney provided the perfect pretext for giving "great exposure" to the organization and to its soccer component.

The Maccabiah Games — or "Jewish Olypmics" — are less than two years away.



ACE

The summer has been a busy one for 14-year-old Alex Iscoe. Over a one week period, the teen, who is legally blind in his right eye, scored a hole in one in the 140-yard seventh hole at the Don Valley Golf Course, was chosen valedictorian for his Grade 9 class at St. Andrews High and was accepted at Upper Canada College for Grade 10. He's played MTHL hockey for seven years, captained the team for three seasons and coaches a Tyke select hockey team.

Hebrew language software finding market

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corredspondent

WINNIPEG — The initial response to his line of Hebrew educational software is promising, says Ron Ben-Ari of Horizon Enterprises.

"I have already received several phone calls about the programs and I have several demonstrations lined up," says the Winnipeg-based importer-exporter.

Ben-Ari has been operating Horizon Enterprises since 1988. "I look for good quality, innovative products," he says.

He is the Canadian distributor for an Israeli-designed welder's helmet where the screen changes color and provides immediate eye protection, as compared to present helmets where the wearer has to lower the screen manually.

Ben-Ari notes that Compedia Software Development Ltd., the Israeli creator of the educational software, has been trying for three years to have him represent the company in Canada.

When he was in Israel in May, he visited the company, was impressed with their products and brought back some of those he considered most suitable for Hebrew as a Second Language students.

The first four programs Ben-Ari has available include Alef-Bet Balloons Plus, a learning game for the Alef-Bet and basic words; Thinking Games, a series of logic activities at varying levels of difficulty designed to develop and improve thinking skills; the Isle of Numbers Plus, an adventure story that introduces children to the world of numbers; and Word-Land, a game where learning and games are combined to make reading and comprehension fun.

"These educational programs are designed for children from ages 5 to 11," Ben-Ari explains. "I realized the tremendous value of these programs when I ran the software on a friend's computer and was pushed aside by her kids who attend one of Winnipeg's Hebrew bilingual programs. We couldn't peel the kids away from the computer."

The programs are IBM compatible and available either individually in 3.5-inch floppy disk format or as a group with Hebrew and English versions on a Gordisk Plus CD-Rom format.

Zionist song competition

Chaim Parchi of Newton, Mass., a multi-talented composer, choreographer, music teacher and specialist in Sehpardi and Yemenite music, won the second annual North America Zionist Song Competition sponsored by the American Zionist Movement (AZM).

A number of the more than 100 entries in this year's contest, including the winning song, reflected dedication to the goals of the peace process and an idealistic concept of brotherhood between Arab and Jew, says AZM president Seymour Reich.

The winning song, From Moses To Mohammed, represents an unusual musical effort to bridge the chasm separating Jews and Arabs. It was chosen by a panel of judges representing songwriters and leaders of the American Jewish Community.

Chaim Parchi

The song competition was held on the campus of the University of Massachusetts.

CHUTZPAH A GO-GO
Featuring Penny Di Marco, David Gale, Bernadette Taylor and Randy Vancourt.
Music and lyrics by David Gale and Randy Vancourt.
Directed by Jordan Merkur, Limelight Dinner Theatre, 2026 Yonge St. $20-$46, 482-5200 Tickets & Groups

Yippee! The Yiddish magical mystery tour is coming to take you away.

Actually, it's the Bubkes Jewish Community Players (all the way from Bubkes, Sask.) on their big national tour. Except they've been inadvertently booked into the basement of St. Rebecca of Perpetual Guilt.

That's the premise for Chutzpah à go-go, a gregarious musical celebration of Canadian Jewish culture and of the Yiddish language. It's much less a story than a cabaret-style review, as the performers warble and shtick their way through a number of tunes that tell the tale of the fictional prairie town of Bubkes.

Actors David Gale and Randy Vancourt wrote the musical in 1991 and teamed up with director Jordan Merkur to unveil it a year later at the Under the Umbrella festival. Since then, the production has expanded to two acts and played at Canadian Stage's Berkeley St. Theatre and the Factory Theatre. It hit the road in 1993 to play at the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre.

Chutzpah à go-go is simply a hoot. It gives a loving caricature of Jewish culture that simultaneously lampoons and embraces the idiosyncrasies of that community. The performances are high-energy and warm, inviting everyone — Jews and gentiles alike — to share in the in-jokes. For those of us whose experience with Yiddish is limited to shtick, shmaltz, shmuck and shlong, the program comes complete with a mini Yiddish-to-English dictionary.

And the music rocks too. It spans a variety of styles, from klezmer to vaudeville to torch song. The tunes are cunningly written, giving the show a delightfully unpredictable pace. Just when you think the performers are heaping on the saccharine, they turn around and kick you (and often themselves) in the tuchas.

It's good theatre.

Tara Charendoff appears in National Lampoon, Senior Trip.

Rising Star: Tara Charendoff, a 20ish actor from Toronto who now lives in Los Angeles, began her career singing in Yiddish and other theatrical productions. Having plunged into television and animated features and made a big splash, she has become the voice of the new cartoon series Gadget Boy, and has just finished a cartoon for Walt Disney called Duck Daze, featuring Donald Duck and his nephews.

She also appears in a new comedy, National Lampoon, Senior Trip, that opened last week in Toronto and a couple of weeks ago in Los Angeles. She plays the part of Carla Morgan. The film is a collaboration between Alliance Films of Toronto and New Line Cinema of Los Angeles.

Tadiran Supplies Batteries For Highway 407

JERUSALEM — An Israeli comany, Tadiran Batteries, has won a contract to supply lithium batteries for roads in Canada.

The tender was held by Mark IV, a Canadian company in charge of construction of Highway 407. So far, Tadiran has received a $125-million order from Mark IV.

Carlsberg Buys 20 Per Cent Of Israel Breweries

JERUSALEM — Carlsberg announced last week it has purchased 20 per cent of Israel Breweries.

The Danish beer manufacturer refused to disclose the sum paid for the transaction.

Air Force, Rada Sign Pact

JERUSALEM — Rada Electronic Industries signed a $10.5-million agreement for the sale of its Fatigue Autonomous Combat Manoeuvres Evaluation System (FACE) to the Royal Netherlands Air Force.

System delivery will begin next year and continue through 1997. The contract does not include add-ons, which may be purchased at a future date.

Leumi Earnings Soar

JERUSALEM — Bank Leumi reported a 162 per cent growth in second-quarter net profits to NIS 71.8 million ($31.59 million), from NIS 21.3 million ($9.37 million) in the same period last year.

Half-year net profits increased 84.4 per cent to NIS 241 million ($106 million) from NIS126.9 million ($55.84 million).

Meanwhile Bank Hapoalim also reported profits including a 43.6 per cent rise in second-quarter net profits to NIS 182.4 million ($80.26 million) from NIS 127.1 million ($55.92million) in the corresponding period last year.

Shohat OKs Coverage Increase For Exporters

JERUSALEM — Israel's Finance Minister Avraham Shohat has authorized, at the request of the Israel Foreign Trade Risks Insurance Co. (IFTRIC), an increase in the amount of coverage for exporters, giving them mid- and long-term credit similar to that now available only in the short-term, the Treasury announced last week.

Mid- and long-term credit — for periods up to 10 years — will be increased from 82.5 per cent to as much as 90 per cent.

Shohat said the increase was mandated because of increasing international competition in the export of capital, industrial equipment, and medical and hi-tech goods.

Israel's National Parks: Israel is spending millions of dollars to lure visitors to its national parks. Over the past three years, the National Parks authority has invested $200 million in improvements to its 43 sites. Last year, more than four million people passed through park gates.

Israel's national parks are actually outdoor museums of history and archaeology. They include Masada, where Jewish zealots committed suicide rather than submit to Roman conquest; Tzippori, which was once the seat of the ancient Sanhedrin; Sde Boker, the burial location of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion; and Beit Guvrin, adorned by hundreds of caves. The authority's green card ($16 US) covers entry to all of its facilities. Individual park fees range from $3 to $5.

Wild West, Jewish Style: Tombstone, Arizona, traditionally conjures up images of Wyatt Earp, his brothers and Doc Holliday shooting it up with the notorious Clanton gang at the OK Corral. Half a mile beyond the OK Corral is a graveyard where many victims of Old West gunplay are buried. According to Travel Talk reader Paul Levin of North York, if you go past these graves and walk down the hill, you'll find a Jewish cemetery.

"There were Jewish merchants, miners and investors," Levin writes. "Names like Bloom, Freudenthal, Lesinsky and Lewisohn were among the original settlers."

However, much of the cemetery is now in ruins, save for a monument featuring names from some of the unreadable headstones.

Levin is president of the Puce Creek Central Railroad, a Toronto-area company that sells model trains.

Dear Jesse,

My father died three weeks ago. While my 72-year-old mother appears to be managing, we are concerned. She is more quiet and stays at home most of the time now. My brothers have decided to clear our father's belongings out of their home as soon as possible. They feel that this will keep her from being constantly reminded of her loss. Are we doing the right thing?

A. L.

Dear A. L.,

While you may have the best of intentions, clearing out your father's belongings may not be the key to your mother's well-being at this time.

The death of a spouse is a devastating life event; this loss can be compounded during the senior years, when individuals face a number of difficult challenges. The death of your father is very recent. Your mother needs time to grieve in her own way and at her pace. You can all help your mother to maintain her physical and emotional health by encouraging her to be checked medically, and to obtain regular sleep and nutrition, as grieving can be draining. Let her know that you are there to listen when she is ready to talk. Your and your family members are all mourning a loss and may benefit from sharing your feelings.

Respect your mother's wishes in every way possible. Do not clear out your father's belongings right away. If possible, major changes and important decisions should wait until they are not so overwhelming. Ask your mother to let you know when she feels better equipped to deal with this task. Her permission and readiness are essential in the healing process.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Supplement to The Canadian Jewish News

Sciarrino's eye enhances Horvath legacy

Beauty may be in the eye of the beholder, but when the beholder is Sam Sciarrino staring through the lens of his camera, enough people agree to keep his wedding photography schedule heavily booked.

It's the subtleties that separate Sciarrino's work from the run-of-the-mill. It goes beyond the mere technical excellence you'd expect from a professional photographer to convey all the nuances of emotion and mood. His photos freeze the moment in a time capsule, to be recreated each time you look at them.

Though weddings are his mainstay, Horvath's services are increasingly in demand for bar and bat mitzvahs. As with adult portrayals, his eye sees beyond the stereotyped "cutesy" poses to reflect the innate character of his subjects. A quick perusal of his portfolio explains why he was hand-picked by the late Tibor Horvath to run the business.

For all his talent, you'll find Sciarrino extremely down to earth. Consultations are relaxed; you can loosen your tie, or even better, leave it in your closet. At weddings, however, he's all business, and dresses like a guest (suit and tie) to allow himself to blend in. This in turn allows his subjects to be more natural because "they forget I'm there."

Some of Horvath's most memorable outings have involved shooting his subjects under seemingly "ordinary" conditions, like a walk in the woods. "Sometimes the simple pleasures we enjoy every day are overlooked in favour of 'spectacular' poses," says Horvath. "They shouldn't be."

Nor should the opportunity to have Horvath photograph your wedding or bar mitzvah.

Bridal Registry with the experts

Brides have flocked to Bronson's Fine China and Gifts for 15 years because of good service, quality merchandise and good prices.

"Customer service is the most important aspect of our business. We have grown and prospered because of our policies and we are always friendly, non-intimidating and helpful," says Ilene Bronsteter who co-owns the store with Bonnie Silver.

She says expert staff spends at least 45 minutes with every bride helping to co-ordinate table settings. "We also help them mix and match with items they already own. We help them choose a dinnerware set that will reflect their taste and lifestyle and even set a table for them so they really get a good feel for what they've chosen. We've noticed that a lot more men are coming in to help decide on a colour or design which proves that choosing a dinnerware pattern is something to be taken seriously. It is no longer left to the bride and her mother to choose, the groom wants to be part of the decision making process."

Budget is a high priority when choosing gifts and the staff at Bronson's knows how important it is to stick to that budget. "We help them pick in the proper price range and show them that there are ways of remaining on budget while making elegant, tasteful choices for their kitchen and dining room. We pride ourselves on always matching another store's prices."

Bronson's is chock full of merchandise from table settings to vases, tablecloths, placemats and some kitchen utensils which are imported from places like Italy, France, Japan and Germany. The leading companies are represented here which gives our customers a great variety of styles and shapes to choose from.

She says colours, which make a statement about a couple's tastes, are quite important in tableware and even glassware. "Transitional china, a nice set which can be used every day and then taken into the dining room for more elegant dinners has become very popular. There is also a lot of mix and match dinnerware — colours that blend and designs that complement. What a lot of people tend to forget is that they spend a lot of time eating and everything tastes better when it is served on tableware that they've chosen and that looks good."

Always stressing customer service, Ilene says Bronson's wraps gifts and has them delivered. Out-of-town guests can call toll-free to purchase a gift. 2 Steeles Ave. W., Thornhill L4J 1A1. (905) 881-9930, (416) 398-3539, 1-800-387-2766.

Bridal Registry
For the past fifteen years, thousands of brides have trusted Bronson's with their Bridal Registry.
Bronson's continues that tradition today. With the ever increasing number of new patterns, styles, and designs in today's market, our helpful, courteous Bridal consultants will be pleased to guide you through our incredible selection of china, flatware, stemware and giftware. And all in a very relaxed atmosphere. We'll assist you in mixing and matching your tableware to suit your new lifestyle.
At Bronson's your guests will be our guests too. From gift wrapping, to same day delivery, our exceptional service ensures that everything comes together beautifully. For your Bridal Registry, trust Bronson's for value, selection, and above all, service.

Beverly Hills Caterers puts Le Parc's kosher kitchen on map at $65 a plate

With the brand new kosher kitchen of Le Parc about to open, Raphy Amar of Beverly Hills Caterers has decided to introduce it to the community at the unbelievably low price of $65 a plate (plus taxes and gratuity, minimum125 people). The limited-time promotion will allow simcha-makers to enjoy the most elegant, refined kosher cuisine in Toronto's premier catering facility at a price that must rank as one of the finest values in Toronto kosher catering history.

In one of Le Parc's five splendid banquet halls — each equipped with its own private bar, piano, and foyer — you'll enjoy a full five-course meal (including full open bar and sweet table) that your guests will savour and remember fondly for years.

Should you decide on an even more elaborate menu, a quick perusal of your choices reveals so many wonderful gourmet dishes that you could almost pick blindfolded. But don't; you'll enjoy mulling over the delicious details.

Choice, choice, and more choice

Hors D'oeuvres. From the international selection of hot and cold hors d'oeuvres, you have a choice of traditional, Italian, Chinese, Mediterranean, Middle Eastern and West Coast favourites.

- Traditional: Ramakis with honey orange sauce;
- Italian: mini pizzas with grilled chicken and tomato pesto sauce;
- Chinese: sui kow with sweet and sour sauce;
- Middle Eastern: Moroccan cigars (mild or spicy);
- West Coast favourites: potato skins filled with chili sauce, or a sushi bar.

Appetizers. Here again, choice and gourmet taste reign supreme:

- Fresh filet of Atlantic salmon over a bed of linguine primavera with a light tomato basil and olive oil sauce;
- Le Parc's special antipasto: roasted peppers and eggplant with melon wedge, avocado bruschetta, strawberry and orange wedge;
- The New York style smorgasbord, which includes a variety of stations that will attract more "passengers" than Grand Central at rush hour. The first stop is the Montreal Hand-Cut Smoked Meat Station. From there you'll hop a plane to the Israeli Station, for houmous, tehina, babaganouch, and falafel with pita. Then it's on to the Chinese Station for oriental wok cookery and your choice of Szechuan orange chicken, Shanghai noodles, and stir-fried Chinese vegetables. Swinging seaward, you'll hook up with the Salmon Station and a selection of gravlox, decorated and carved poached salmon. Finally, a pit stop in sunny Italy for a trifecta of pasta dishes: linguine with sundried tomatoes in a basil pesto sauce garnished with pine nuts; penne arrabiata; and gnocchi with a basil pesto sauce.

Now that you've "oversampled" a few of the appetizers, you can turn over a new leaf with the salads. East and West meet beautifully in Raphy's San Fernando Valley style Chinese chicken salad, as julienned grilled breast of chicken hobnobs with Boston bibb lettuce, green onions, mandarin oranges and bean sprouts in a mandarin sesame oil dressing. Back to Italy for a sharp radichio Italiano with radichio, belgium endives, hearts of palm and toasted almonds in a raspberry vinaigrette dressing, served with foccacio.

Don't tell us you're full already; Raphy's just getting warmed up!

Main dishes. Your choice of:

- Beef: Beef wellington in a mushroom bordelaise sauce; or
- Veal: Veal marsala with marsala wine demiglass; or
- Lamb: Rack of lamb aux fines herbes; or
- Chicken: Chicken piccata with lemon and caper sauce; or
- Fish: Halibut cajun style.

For the kinderlach who aren't quite ready to appreciate the finer points of gourmet cooking and are sold on "fun food," there's a children's menu that includes egg rolls with plum sauce, choice of pasta, hamburgers, chicken fingers, submarine sandwiches, french fries, onion rings, and corn on the cob.

Dessert, anyone?

Confirmed chocaholics will stake a claim to the frozen chocolate kahlua cake, the hazelnut mocha dacqoise and the chocolate raspberry torte; others will gravitate towards the crème anglaise with raspberry sauce, the charlotte Russse and the fresh fruit tarts. Beverages include coffee, tea, Irish coffee, Spanish coffee and espresso.

Strict adherence to kashruth

Since becoming the exclusive Kosher Caterer at Le Parc, Beverly Hills Caterers has hosted several large organizational affairs (over 500 guests). With its expert kitchen and wait staff, Le Parc is well equipped to handle functions of any size, and with Beverly Hills Caterers' savoir-faire and strict adherence to kashruth, it's a marriage made in kosher catering heaven.

Catering is "more than a business to me," says Raphy. "Food preparation and presentation are everything to me." Even before you taste the fruits of his labours, a quick glance at any table bearing his handiwork reveals an almost fanatical attention to detail. His sweet tables in particular show a Picasso-esque talent for sculpting (see the carved watermelons on the cover). Many caterers promise original cuisine, but this California wunderkind really delivers.

During his ten-year stint in Los Angeles, Raphy served as exclusive kosher caterer to Beth Jacob Synagogue, L.A.'s largest orthodox congregation. He had the opportunity to host many gala affairs and theme parties, many involving the "who's who" of Hollywood. He even catered to the M.A.S.H. crew! His expertise is now at your disposal, and he's more than happy to help you coordinate all aspects of your simcha.

Raphy is a Shomer Shabbos caterer and can meet any requirements, including Lubavitch Schechita. Mechitsas can be arranged on request.

Elegant glatt kosher dining at Le Parc is now within reach

Having your simcha at Le Parc means enjoying a number of features you won't find at any other catering facility. For example, each banquet room boasts its own private entrance (through stately chuppa-like vine-clad arches) and foyer, bar, dance floor, piano and bride's room. Sprawling skylights spanning the building's exterior let the sun shine in on lush gardens within, providing a compelling backdrop for any chuppa arrangement.

Each of these halls (ranging in capacity from 150 to 1,000 people) is a little world unto itself which affords you and your guests complete privacy.

At last, the ultimate in kosher cuisine in the ultimate facility at a highly approachable price. It's an opportunity whose time has come, and Raphy is "thrilled and delighted" to help you make the most of it.

Can a glamorous, romantic gown also be elegant and simple? Joy Cherry says Yes

When Joy Cherry converted the second floor at 3323 Yonge Street into a bridal salon, she envisaged it as a natural extension of the trend-setting environment that has made the main floor a Toronto fashion landmark.

"Many brides get flustered in their quest for the right gown because they feel they're leaving the world of fashion and entering a world of endless ruffles and lace," says bridal consultant Carol Gold. "After a while, all the gowns start to run together." At Joy Cherry, on the other hand, "picking a wedding gown is like picking out a dress – a beautiful dress that's a joy to wear, no pun intended." That's because, according to Carol, Joy Cherry "is always on the cutting edge of fashion so that we can offer our brides today's look of sophisticated, understated elegance — not an outdated stereotype of what a bride should look like."

Does that mean that Joy Cherry Bridal has forsaken romance? Far from it, says Carol. Each of the designer lines Joy Cherry carries – most of them exclusive to her in Canada – is hand-picked not only for its originality but also for the specific niche it occupies in the spectrum of bridal "moods." For the old-fashioned (but still sophisticated) romantic look, there's Priscilla. For a more European/Victorian look, Joy gives you Christos. Then there's Vera Wang, who pioneered the "less is more" look of understated elegance fast becoming a fashion standard in the bridal industry. It's a look that harks back to the glamour of black-and-white movies and conjures up images of Lauren Bacall and Humphrey Bogart. (Look in the mirror when you're trying on a Vera Wang and you may see Lauren staring back at you approvingly. If you spot Bogey lurking in the shadows, you'll understand that he's simply ill at ease with today's "No Smoking" code.)

Mirror, mirror, on the wall . . .

One of the reasons Vera Wang's work is in such demand now, says Carol, is that brides are more mature now, and often prefer a simpler, sophisticated look to the fanciful frills of yesteryear. The gown that's just right for you should stand on its own merits as a fashion garment, Carol says; a wedding dress is, after all, a dress. If it doesn't work fashion-wise — the fit, the cut, the style, the colour — then "no amount of frills or lace will make it better."

Dress must stand on own merits

To help clients avoid the pitfalls of overkill, she encourages them to "forget they're buying a wedding dress and look at it for a moment as simply a dress. Does it work? Is it something you'd be proud to be seen in?"

The advice Carol gives is Golden from the get-go. The term "consultant" is loosely used in the bridal industry nowadays, but in Carol you're getting the real McGold. Her many years of experience in the fashion and bridal industries are at your disposal. A mirror for your thoughts and needs (with all due respect to Lauren), her expert counsel is as indispensable as the surround mirrors that envelope the bridal stage perched in the centre of the salon, affording an all-angles view of your dress. Carol strives for that magic moment when "the dress is just right and you know it's right." Then and only then does she allow herself to feel that the consultation has been a success.

Being a fashion pioneer carries the responsibility for steering your customers in the right direction. "We're a leader," says Gold. In the bridal salon, as on the main floor, Joy Cherry never stands still, always moving forward with the latest fashion looks. This is the standard her clients have come to expect, and she "wouldn't have it any other way. Our customers expect the world, and we deliver it — on a silver platter."

Once your lofty expectations of a bridal gown are duly met, you can crown yourself with an exquisite porcelain headpiece (made exclusively for Joy Cherry) and embellish your digitary extremities (i.e. decorate your hands and feet) with a full range of bridal accessories. "Another advantage our brides have is that they can accessorize on the spot", says Carol. "Taking swatches to jewellery stores and shoe stores is guesswork at best. Here you get the total look under one roof, and the result is far superior to buying piecemeal." It also saves scads of valuable time. Shoes, jewellery, undergarments — all can be purchased in the friendly confines of Joy Cherry Bridal, in total comfort and privacy.

One-stop haute mode shopping

It comes as no surprise that Carol's appointment book reads like a "who's who" of the Jewish community. What is surprising is that you can purchase one of these marvellous gowns, together with custom fittings as needed and unparalleled personal service, for as little as $1500. The salon's level of activity indicates that its clientele feels comfortable with the quality and service they're getting for a gown they won't find anywhere else.

Much more than bridal

On the main floor, you'll find all the special occasion wear one needs. Designs by Eavis & Brown, Thierry Mugler, Angel Sanchez, Louis Féraud, Peter Keppler, and Vera Wang are hand-picked by Joy with you in mind. But, as Joy explains, hand-picking is a two-way street.

"We hand-pick our designers, but they also hand-pick us," she says. "Though Vera Wang is very big now, she won't sell to just any store." Joy Cherry isn't just any store, and it's the only store in Canada that carries Vera Wang.

When you ascend Joy's "staircase to bridal heaven," it's only fitting that you should be greeted by a massive skylight that spans the entire salon, letting the sun shine in on your hopes and dreams. You have the rest of your life to be down to earth; now is a time for Joy.

Funny how brides who want the utmost in personal service when choosing the most fabulous gowns in North America's most striking skylit bridal salon always wind up at Joy Cherry

25 Years of Service

Buying a gown at Lina's Boutique is an experience in attention to detail. Every single aspect of the fit and fittings is examined under a microscope — a trait that's helped forge the enviable reputation that has earned Lina's the Toronto Sun's "Reader's Choice" award on more than one occasion.

Though Lina's doesn't advertise itself as a custom house, by the time you leave, your "ready-to-wear" gown has become the equivalent of a custom creation at a nominal alteration charge. As manager Patricia Pollari explains: "Garments come in standard sizes. Peple seldom do. A Lina's client has the right to expect her gown to fit like it was made for her alone."

At Lina's, there are four separate bridal salons, each with a full-time bridal consultant. Each consultant has an average of 10 years' experience; the alterationists who work with them are skilled veterans as well. Pollari herself has worked as a designer, and has also travelled as a buyer.

Lina's is a family business. Owner Lina (Patricia's mother) is active daily in running the operation. With continuity stretching over two generations, the daughters of brides who bought their gowns at Lina's have become clients in this generation.

Over half of Lina's business comes from referrals; consistent high quality of service has kept the referral network constantly growing. They operate on the principal that each customer is unique and it pays to take the time to ensure her fashion needs are met.

To meet that need, Lina's carries designer gowns from such traditional centres as New York and Italy as well as Texas, Las Vegas, Montreal and our own Toronto. Wedding gowns and virtually all associated accessories carry designer names like Eve of Milady, Sposabelia and Scaasi; there are mother-of-the-bride gowns from Italy and a quality mix of conservative and avant garde cocktail gowns and dresses bearing designer, private and exclusive labels. Consultants will also design gowns and accessories — even a pair of gloves! — from a picture brought in by a client.

For variety's sake, Lina's is adding more accessories, like gift boxes and invitation books. This gives the bride the opportunity to match complementary items on the spot.

Lina's has been in business for 25 years, 20 of them at the current location. As we go to press, some bargain hunters are taking advantage of their annual bridal gown sale on Sept. 10 at the Jupiter Ball Room of the Constellation Hotel.

Lina's will participate in the bridal shows held in September and January at the Convention Centre, and in February at the Automotive Building.

Lina's Boutique is located at 1901 Weston Road, at Lawrence, on the north-east corner; phone (416) 241-8087.

Ital Florist makes festive addition to Hazelton Lanes

The word "flowers" conjures up images of glorious colour. Yet sadly, colour is the one ingredient often lacking from some of today's "minimalist" floral showrooms.

At Ital Florist in Hazelton Lanes, however, your encounter with colour will be close and of the first kind. In the grand tradition of old-fashioned flower shops, Ital is crammed with wall-to-wall arrangements, showering the Lanes with a rainbow of colour from its vantage point in the west wing of the lower concourse.

Manager Evelyn Paris (whose father Eligio founded the business 20 years ago and still runs the original store in Etobicoke, with his son Italo and daughter Ester) promises clients three things for their wedding and other special occasion needs: Service, Service, and more Service. "We'll not only visit the site on your wedding day to see you through, we'll even go there a few months in advance to make sure the arrangements are perfect," she says. If the ceremony and the reception are being held at different sites, she or Italo will be happy to transport your flowers from the synagogue to the reception site at no additional charge. Consultations are extensive and complimentary.

Despite the Hazelton Lanes location and the quality and style you'd expect with it, Evelyn affirms that Ital's prices are "highly competitive; in fact, no one in the city can offer more for the price."

Ital's arrangements run the gamut from traditional to elaborate, and are designed to suit your taste while keeping pace with the latest floral trends. According to Paris, roses are in, as are summer flowers, Queen Anne's lace, Casablanca lillies, fillers, lots of ivy and other greenery for a cascading effect. Such highlights are particularly popular for decorating chuppahs, of which Ital offers a variety, from the very simple (sometimes without any flowers at all) to the intricately wreathed and layered.

"The exotic look is out, the soft, natural look is in," says Evelyn. In keeping with today's environmentally-friendly philosophy, many people want a romantic look that blends seamlessly with the site as opposed to making an overpowering statement. "You want your guests to remember the flowers in the context of the ceremony or reception, not as a sideshow," says Evelyn. Selection is critical in achieving this effect, and that's where Ital's expertise comes into play. And having a multitude of real flowers on hand – as opposed to just photographs – makes the selection process easier.

Paris jokes that she'd "love to sneak out in the middle of the night and decorate the entire Hazelton Lanes" with beautiful flowers, but "management might have a word or two to say about that."

Then again, after seeing her work, maybe they wouldn't mind at all.

Clients choose Regal for all the right reasons

Whether for your wedding or any other function, choosing a Kosher caterer can be as simple as dialing a number. Once you start weighing the pros and cons of caterer A versus caterer B, however, choosing the right one can become a decision of epic proportions.

Then there's Regal.

Under the management of principals Joe Elmaleh, C.A., Rabbi A.J. Eisenberger, and Irwin Diamond, Regal has emerged as a compelling alternative to other caterers, by offering clients a host of "pros", in both senses of the word.

First, Regal offers a huge menu, ranging from traditional to contemporary, from Far Eastern through Middle Eastern to Continental; they cover almost every corner of the culinary globe. More important, their European chefs have the professional expertise to deliver an authentic dining experience in each category.

"Selection is only meaningful when you have the talent in the kitchen to carry it off," says catering manager Joanne Katz. "When we offer our clients a range of choices, we do so with the conviction that each menu will be customized to the needs and wants of each client. Each choice is distinctive."

Among Regal's delicacies are Chicken Venezia, a fully deboned half chicken marinated and grilled to perfection, complemented by steamed garlic vegetables and mini roasted potatoes. Or try the Rib Eye Steak, delicious with button mushrooms in Bordelaise sauce, accompanied by stir fried vegetables and rice or potato. The Fresh Rainbow Trout is always popular, broiled with fresh salsa, accompanied by stir fried vegetables and mini red potatoes.

Pastas galore

There are many pastas, enjoyable as a starter – such as Fussili Primavera, a 3-color spiral pasta salad tossed with fresh vegetables, garlic and extra virgin olive oil. Pasta dishes may also serve as health-conscious alternative entrées. Any entrée can be complemented with Regal house salad, and either Bruschetta allia, Napolitana or tasty garlic bread.

To end the meal, desserts run the gamut from a simple sorbet to a full mouth-watering sweet table with mousses, assorted cakes, petits fours, and mirrors of beautifully presented fresh fruit.

Regal is also committed to keeping Kosher food available to everyone at reasonable prices.

As with the food, so with the service. "Quality," says Joanne, "is achieved through attention to detail, and to the wishes and needs of the individual client."

Judging by the numbers of weddings, engagement parties, showers, and bar or bat mitzvahs they're booking with Regal, the clients must agree. The catering office is always delightfully busy, a humming, bustling beehive of activity.

Drawing on her years of experience in Kosher catering, Joanne dispenses both professional knowledge and a bubbly, high-energy enthusiasm. She is not shy about enumerating the merits of partying "chez Regal". This extroverted approach has endeared Joanne to clients and employers alike.

You can't argue with success. Already, after just 1 1/2 years, Joanne can take pride in the fact that her approach has brought many new clients to Regal, and increased repeat and referral business. She feels that her clients have become her friends.

Regal offers one significant plus which other caterers don't: a permanent Glatt Kosher restaurant, King Solomon's Table, on the same premises as the dining facilities. With its own permanent Kosher kitchen located at the Montecassino Place Hotel, at 3710 Chesswood Drive in Downsview, just north of Sheppard between Keele and Dufferin, Regal offers Kosher customers the opportunity to dine there throughout the simcha period. If you're in from out of town, this is very convenient.

Glatt kosher restaurant on site

If you loved a dish and would like to enjoy it again, you can. The fare at King Solomon's Table runs the same eclectic gamut as the catering menus, allowing you to recreate the pleasure of the experience as often as you want. Regal Kosher Caterers also supplies the Wok 'N Deli, at 441 Clarke Avenue West in Thornhill.

Because both restaurants are also available for smaller functions, many clients take advantage of them for events like business luncheons or intimate dinner parties. If, on the other hand, it's in-home catering that you need, you will be given the care and attention your event deserves. No party is too small.

Joanne states that it is "a privilege and a pleasure" to work with her clients, and will take every step to ensure that your wedding, engagement party, shower or other affair is a success. To book your special occasion, call Joanne Katz at (416) 630-0303.

HOW TO HAVE A SENSATIONAL SIMCHA

When the number you call is 630-0303, a celebration has a way of magically unfolding as it should. The service is expert, prompt, and courteous. The food is splendid, the ambience wonderful.

When you call Regal Kosher Caterers, your wants and needs are addressed from A to Z. Everything you need is conveniently under one roof: Fabulous ballrooms. Exquisite international cuisine (prepared on the premises in our permanent Kosher kitchen). Beautiful table settings. Comfortable accommodations for your out-of-town guests. A full-service Glatt Kosher restaurant (King Solomon's Table) right on the premises for your everyday dining. King Solomon's is also available for your smaller functions (up to 120 people) on Saturday night or Sunday morning/afternoon.

Give Catering Manager Joanne Katz a call. She'll make you remember 630-0303 as a number that gives you satisfaction.

Youth plus experience equals a winning combination

For over 30 years, Sam Firestone Caterers (Glatt Kosher) has been the exclusive caterer to Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. The family tradition of high standards has made the Firestone name famous; Les is dedicated to maintaining the standards that his father Sam has created.

As the New Year arrives, Les Firestone reflects on the great affairs of the past year. "Value for the dollar will always be in style," he says. "If we put smiles on our customers' faces, we've done our job. The proof that our approach works is in the many letters of thanks we get after the job is done." Also, he gets great satisfaction from the number of customers who come back for their next simcha.

Innovative menus make each party exciting and unique, for the caterer as well as the customers. The selection ranges from traditional meat dishes to vegetarian, and the Firestones keep pace with trends like the growing preference for lighter foods. They offer more vegetarian dishes than ever before, and more original ways of preparing chicken and fish. Everything is cooked to order.

Menus can be customized to suit individual tastes and budgets, with price options ranging from modest to lavish. Some clients don't even look at the set menu, and have everything customized. "We never forget the kids," Les adds. "Today, their tastes are often quite sophisticated."

The team relies on a low-key, no-nonsense approach; the customer wants to see the fine points looked after, right down to the color of the decorations. Because a great chef is indispensable, executive chef Jimmy Lyras and his team are always available to assist the customer.

Sam and Les combine the experience of skilled veterans with the energetic enthusiasm of youth. While Sam is active as a consultant, Les, as catering manager, does the hands-on work, from the initial interview until the affair ends. Les is always the last one to go home. "It's all part of the job," he smiles. "We give extra, but we don't charge extra – and that philosophy applies to our time as well as the food."

Firestone is Glatt Kosher, under strict supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.). There is a full-time mashgiach on the premises.

Firestone caters all occasions: weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, engagement parties, receptions and sports banquets.

The best dates go fast, though, so call now to book your wedding or other special event. Sam Firestone Caterers is in Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, at 470 Glencairn Ave.; ask for Les Firestone at 782-8022 or 221-6329 (fax 789-1728).

Stavros craftsmanship prized by discerning men the world over

What do comedian Jerry Lewis and King Constantine of Greece have in common? They both have ordered custom-made suits from Stavros Master Tailor and Shirtmaker. Located in the heart of Yorkville, the store at 95 Cumberland St. re-opened recently after extensive renovations designed to further enhance its appeal as the custom tailoring destination of choice.

Owner Stavros Theodoro-Poulos, who trained as a master tailor in his native Greece, has been making suits for influential executives and celebrities for more than 40 years. Stavros, as he prefers to be called, said his clients come from as far away as England and San Francisco because they want the quality and craftsmanship he offers.

It takes 32 hours to make one of his suits, 90% of which is hand-sewn. The cloth is hand-picked by Stavros from the finest mills in England and Italy.

Stavros says the fit of made-to-measure suits, cut from individualized paper patterns, is far superior to factory-made ones. A made-to-measure suit fits like a glove and is tapered at the waist, hips and chest to follow an individual's body shape. "The end result is far more flattering" than a loose or ill-fitting factory-made jacket, says Stavros.

The outer cloth of a Stavros suit is hand-cut and stitched onto a canvas foundation in the shoulders and the front torso which holds the shape of the suit. "The foundation of the suit is like the foundation of a house. Without the canvas, the suit bags and sags."

According to Stavros, the detailing on his suits cannot be replicated by machines: each button hole is sewn by hand, the breast pockets are angled so that the pattern of the material can be matched vertically and horizontally, and the cuffs are all surgeons' cuffs — the buttons actually open and close, unlike those on the cuffs of off-the-rack jackets, which are merely decorative.

But the hand-made tailored suit may go the route of the dodo bird. Stavros said he is concerned custom tailoring is a dying craft: most European-trained master tailors are in their 50s and 60s and there's no one in the following generation to replace these artisans.

"Now is the time to enjoy the luxury of a made-to-measure suit," he said, "because they may not be available in the future."

"Boutique Hotel" offers many wedding benefits

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will take care of them all under one roof, meaning less stress on the wedding party, and more enjoyment for everyone — bride, groom, family and friends.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 200 people, starting at $78 per guest, plus gratuity and taxes.

When you book your function at this marvelously mid-sized downtown hotel, which offers free parking after 6 p.m. for all guests of the bridal party, you'll find something special in store for both bride and groom.

The festivities begin at 6 p.m. with a one-hour cocktail reception featuring complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and sparkling wine afterwards for toasts. There is a four-hour host bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

The bride and groom may enjoy three complimentary nights at an Inter-Continental hotel in New York, Washington D.C., Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles, San Francisco, or Maui. Or, there is the alternative of one free room on the wedding night for every $1,000 spent, to a maximum of five nights. For example, if there are 75 guests at $78 each, totalling $5,850, there would be five complimentary rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends. (These figures do not include taxes and gratuity.)

Rates start at $155 for a single or double room, with special rates during the slow season. When they arrive on their wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will be pleased to organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. The catering manager will attend to every detail to ensure all goes smoothly. This level of service is in keeping with Hotel Inter-Continental's profile: it's a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto is located at 220 Bloor Street West, just west of Avenue Road, across from the Royal Conservatory of Music. For more information, ask for the catering manager at (416) 960-5200.

Get swept off you feet in more ways than one.

At Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto, we make any simcha elegantly distinctive and respectfully traditional. Celebrate in one of our elegant reception rooms with up to 250 guests, or under the stars in our outdoor courtyard. And enjoy a special Mazel Tov gift – a complimentary overnight stay for every $1,000 you spend on Food & Beverage.

"Shop the rest, then come to the best"

Mattress Showcase is the first company of its kind in Canada. Our goal is simple: to supply our customers with beds that fit their needs. Buying a mattress can be confusing; we want to make it straightforward. We have Canada's largest top-quality bed selection, and a knowledgeable, educated staff to help you choose what best suits you.

We offer the best products at the lowest possible prices. Our promotion is mainly by word of mouth, minimizing costs; savings are passed on to the consumer, who can purchase the right bed at tremendous reduction.

Mattress Showcase has also introduced "BLOX" juvenile children's furniture featuring over 14 vibrant colour selections and numerous groupings of kids furniture.

One of the major requirements for a manufacturing partner of Mattress Showcase, is the ability and dedication to produce the highest quality of merchandise. We carry famous brands like Simmons Beautyrest, Simmons Beautysleep, Spring Air, Serta and King Koil.

All products sold by us are backed by a manufacturer's warranty. We replace or exchange any product from Mattress Showcase, if you are not completely satisfied, for up to 30 days after purchase.

The Bath Boutique at Taps bubbles over with gifts

If original gift ideas aren't flowing from your brain like water from the tap, then maybe it's time you turned on to Taps.

Chock-full of bath accessories in every conceivable colour, finish and price range, the Bath Boutique at Taps offers you so many choices you may be tempted to siphon off some of your gift money (perish the thought!) and treat yourself to a new towel bar or shower curtain.

Taps' Bath Boutique has everything and then some

Everyone advertises selection, but at Taps they really mean it. Try over 100 — count 'em! — different towel bars, from the most basic ceramic models to the most extravagant gold-plated masterpiece. They have literally hundreds of shower curtains priced from $24 to over $200, in solids, patterns, and stripes, many with unusual weaves and finishes — if there's an art gallery for shower curtains, this is it.

One of the hottest items, reports manager Sally McKay-LePage, is a heated towel bar that "toasts" your towels on those cold fall/winter mornings when you really don't feel like getting out of a warm bath or shower (we trust you'll have a few of those). "It's a novel gift idea that's both whimsical and practical," says Sally. "It makes the wake-up call a lot easier." You can choose from a variety of models, from the most basic to a computer-controlled deluxe model with a timer.

Need some towels to toast? Taps has the Rhapsody Royale line, 100% Egyptian combed cotton, in 18 fashion colours. If your tastes run to the exotic, there are exquisite designer towels with intricate tassels and weaves made in Paris by Yves Delorme.

Taps carries the finest brand names in the business to ensure quality and satisfaction: shower hardware by Spirella, mirrored medicine cabinets by Manhattan, wall-mounted accessories by Inda, Aqua Brass, Baldwin and Jado; cosmetic bags by Maggie B.; toiletries for men and women by Caswell-Massey; and more.

Even the seemingly mundane items like towel stands (in a variety of colours and finishes), toilet paper dispensers (dozens to choose from) and toilet bowl brushes (in 16 vibrant decorator colours) become a home fashion event at Taps. "What makes our selection so unique is that most of these items are generally overlooked when people are shopping for gifts," says Sally. With this in mind, Taps created a Bridal Registry in June; you can arrange an appointment with Sally at (416) 785-0224.

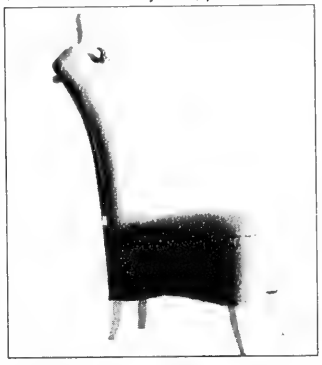
Taps also carries a large variety of bathroom safety bars, which make a thoughtful anniversary or birthday present for anyone who is physically challenged due to age or infirmity.

When you shop for bath accessories at Taps, you have the advantage not only of a knowledgeable staff, but also of having some 16 model bathrooms on the premises in which to view items before you decide which ones to buy.

Palazzetti beautifies newleyweds' homes with unique, practical items

If there's a home in your future and you're looking for a gift of lasting value, Palazzetti (located in the TAPS building at 1020 Lawrence Avenue West) is brimming with unusual pieces that will add panache to any living environment.

The lady of the house will enjoy the Ancella chair (pictured below), which also doubles as a jacket, pant and coat hanger, and stores socks, belts or scarves under the seat. In a monumental design feat, Mauro Lovi has integrated all of these functions into an extremely compelling package with beautiful flowing lines that would do justice to any living room.



Palazzetti's pieces not only look good, they're easy to live with, says owner Fabia Sadoch. "We're seeing a trend away from the extreme designs of a few years ago that sacrificed comfort," she says. "Today people want a sofa or chair that's both stylish and easy to sit on."

Items marrying diverse elements such as wood and stone, wood and metal, and glass with both of the above are in demand now, says Sadoch. Palazzetti has a variety of unique night tables and coffee tables of this type.

Accent pieces abound, from designer lamps to French coatracks to the much-in-demand Fornasetti plates, two of which are pictured below. The collection is the work of Italian artist Piero Fornasetti, now deceased, whose legacy lives on through the eyes of the mysterious woman that graces each of his plates.

One of the factors that has spurred Palazzetti's sales, according to Sadoch, is customers' growing awareness that they sometimes have to grab items they like when they see them, since none are mass-produced and cannot always be re-ordered promptly. As clients become more attuned to their own tastes, they tend to trust their instincts more readily, she says.

Winter Warmup

Bridal Registry

Getting out of the bath or shower in the morning will soon become a chilling experience. Taps has the perfect antidote.

Our heated towel bars will toast your favourite towel so you can snuggle right into fluffy comfort. Don't worry, hubby won't be left out in the cold – there's enough room for his towel too.

The Park Plaza Hotel – the Perfect Setting for your Special Occasion

A perfect midtown location and a truly romantic setting, the Park Plaza Hotel has for over 60 years catered engagement and rehearsal parties, weddings, anniversaries, bar/bat mitzvahs, and social occasions of all kinds.

Permanent kosher kitchen

The permanent kosher kitchen was opened in 1987 and over the past nine years the Park Plaza Hotel has been offering excellent kosher cuisine, specializing in catering events for 30 to 300 guests.

A successful and memorable wedding can begin in the Park Plaza Hotel with the ceremony and the reception to follow taking place in either of the two main ballrooms (the Empress or Plaza Rooms) or in The Roof, one of the most romantic settings in Toronto with an unparalleled view of the city. One visit and it's easy to see why the Park Plaza has been a favourite wedding and bar mitzvah destination of the community for generations. The tradition lives on, as does the wonderful service and attention to detail that built it.

The catering team, headed by Lianne Adelson (Catering Manager), David Robitaille (Banquet Maître D.,) and Joan Monfaredi (Executive Sous Chef) will help you plan your special event down to the last detail. Whether you're planning a wedding reception, engagement party or rehearsal dinner, Lianne offers her expertise to arrange your special occasion to your taste and requirements. Naturally, she is available to help you select a classic gourmet menu, a traditional kosher meal, or give advice on wine.

Attentive service

Lianne is always on hand to help you plan the details of your function and eliminate the guesswork. To experience the Park Plaza personal service and to start planning your perfect wedding, call Lianne Adelson directly at 924-5471, extension 1360.

The Tradition Continues . . . .
There's a reason why more people hold their special occasions at the Park Plaza than anywhere else.
Actually, there are several reasons. Like an outstanding kosher kitchen with an international reputation for excellence.
Like a 60-year track record for successful simchas (just ask Mom and Dad). Like The Roof with its fabulous view.
Who could ask for more? Actually, you can. Our pleasure.

Adele Wechsler's secret: making every detail count

Simple, clean lines are clearly making a comeback in bridal circles, reappearing in wedding gowns after decades of dormancy. In Adele Wechsler's case, however, no "comeback" was necessary, such attributes having remained firmly in her repertoire (and evident in her work) throughout her career.

While containing less fabric and usually less layering than the traditional wedding gown, this type of dress can be even more difficult to construct, says Wechsler. "When you reduce a gown to the basics — to the geometry of the female form, the drape of the fabric over the body – there's far less margin for error, and no frills to hide behind," she says. "A poor fit is immediately apparent. There may be less detail, but there's as much meaningful detail – sometimes more."

In the latter regard, Wechsler's couturier skills have stood her in good stead. The consummate craftswoman, she draws not only on her formal fashion training, but on an extensive design career which began in custom knits. The unusual juxtapositions of fabrics and textures which characterized her early work have resurfaced in her bridal and special occasion wear, and are her signature. Intricacy without overkill permeates her collections; even pieces that tend towards the whimsical are always eminently wearable. Silk peau-de-soie, silk ribbon lace, and guipure lace are strategically applied in just the right quantities to make the garment come alive.

Women looking for a gown with a distinctive personality – off the mainstream, but not overstated – actively seek Wechsler out for their wedding and other special occasion needs. "The secret is not in the amount of detail," says Wechsler, "but in making every detail count."

Deblins Linens offers brides boutique quality at warehouse prices

The Chitiz family of Deblins Linens, with 47 years in the linen trade, have the knowledge and experience that enable them to offer what president Ellis Chitiz calls "boutique quality at warehouse prices".

Deblins is a family business with a dedicated staff who maintain a level of service that keeps regular customers coming back. Deblins also draws many referrals, including hard-to-convince customers who comparison shop before they decide.

When the Chitiz family created their warehouse Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd. in 1994, they wanted to offer their customers the four things which had enabled their business to grow over the years: quality of merchandise, selection, low prices, and service.

At Deblins Linens, you will find exactly what you want and need in a huge variety of bedding, table linens, bathware and accessories — and helpful, well-informed staff to answer all your questions and advise you on matters like color co-ordination. You'll find this especially useful when arranging your bridal registry. By the time you're done at Deblins, your "home sweet home" will be much more than a figure of speech.

Need sheets? If it covers a bed and it's fine quality, Deblins has it, in a full range of sizes, patterns and colors. They carry Wamsutta, Croscill, Revman, Crown Craft, Martex, Carrington, Springmaid, Fieldcrest and other brand names, including the Veratex line which is printed in Israel. There are also sheets for odd-sized mattresses to choose from.

Deblins' wide assortment of ready-made drapes, curtains and valances are chosen to match all sheet designs — thus making it easier for you to beautify your entire home by buying all your dry goods at Deblins.

There is an abundant stock of first-quality pillow coverings, duvets and duvet covers, with five different styles of duvets, and nine different styles of pillows. White Canadian goose down duvets are available in all weights and sizes, at exceptional prices, and with a host of complementary coverings.

How about towels? If you like solid colors, there are Dundee towels, as well as Fieldcrest Royal Velvet in 24 solid colours. For those who prefer designs, there are Jacquard towels, and Spirella printed towels — all quality brand names, always at the lowest possible prices.

There are plenty of bath accessories, like soap dishes, tumblers, tissue and lotion dispensers, and toothbrush holders, all of which can be coordinated with the towels. Of course, there is also a wide assortment of shower curtains, linens and mats.

If you're looking for tablecloths, napkins, napkin rings and table pads for your Sabbath table or everyday dining, you can find them at Deblins. In this department too, the top brand names are always in stock, at the lowest prices anywhere.

In fact, Deblins prices are so low they don't even offer discounts to designers. At the same time, they carry only the best quality — no irregulars or seconds. For this reason, Deblins does not match prices: "If you can find it cheaper elsewhere," says Ellis Chitiz, "buy it." He is confident that when you compare price and quality, you will find that Deblins offers the better deal.

"When you walk through our door," says Ellis, "we don't expect you to compromise. When you walk out of our door, you will be carrying quality linen, at probably the best price in the city; and you will definitely have enjoyed the best service. If you have a problem with any one of these three, let me know."

Along with quality, selection and pricing, Deblins adheres to the tradition of small-store personal service. If you have any questions about product or fabric care, staff will answer them promptly and expertly. In the rare event you don't find what you want or need in stock, staff will order it for you, or custom-make it at an excellent price.

Deblins' largest store is the Superstore at 39 Orfus Rd., with 10,000 square feet of merchandise: (416) 782-2910. In addition, Deblins has stores in the Promenade Mall at Bathurst and Centre St., (905) 709-0007, and the Mississauga Home and Design Centre at Winston Churchill and Dundas St., (905) 820-1509. All three stores are open seven days a week.

Improve your night life.

Getting married is no reason to give up on your night life. It's just that you'll probably be spending more time in rather than out. That's where Deblins Linens comes in. We offer you a dazzling selection of high quality linens and duvets that will turn any ordinary bedroom into a beautiful, romantic retreat.

Dreaming of a special style? Bold colours, embellished patterns, distinctive stripes... you'll find it all at Deblins. And with our famously low prices, you can rest easy.

But we're not just great in bedding. We carry a full selection of matching draperies, table linens, towels and bath accessories. Better still, a bridal registry at Deblins is a great way to ensure that your surroundings will reflect your – and his – good taste.

To create a bedroom that successful marriages are built on, visit us. It may not stop him from hogging the covers, but it's a great way to spice up your life – day and night.

Committed to Excellence

Before the Radisson, there was the Valhalla Inn Markham. About 90% of the staff have been with the Radisson since it opened in 1990; in the hospitality industry, with its high turnover, this is an accomplishment, showing the success of the hotel's policy of caring for their staff.

This policy also promotes continuity in service. Among those who have been there since 1990, for example, is executive chef Chris Probst; former guests keep coming back, knowing they will be well cared for when the same staff is there to serve them.

Its commitment to excellence has made the Radisson North Toronto's most award-winning hotel. It has received the Canadian Automobile Association's Four Diamond Award, given in advance for 1996, and the Business Excellence and Cultural and Community Enrichment Awards from the Markham Board of Trade.

Carol Loschke-Wilson, Director of Marketing and Sales, is not shy in talking about these awards. She states simply: "We have wonderful staff . . . It is mainly due to them that we have won prestige awards and built a reputation among repeat clientele. Also, our commitment to our community has been very important to us since our opening."

People entering the Radisson are struck by the beauty of the main foyer, which looks out into the hotel's garden courtyard. Not visible from outside the hotel, the courtyard is beautiful all year, but spectacular in the autumn.

The Radisson offers 2 3,000 sq. ft. ballrooms, on separate floors to give more privacy, 1 on the main floor, 1 on the second. Each has natural window light, overlooking the garden courtyard, and a bright open foyer, enclosed in glass to create an atrium effect, which leads into the courtyard. The courtyard itself can be reserved for wedding photos, receptions, or even the wedding.

For more private gatherings like wedding rehearsal dinners or showers, there are 2 hospitality suites. Then there are 5 smaller executive boardrooms, with large, bright windows and stunning outside views, ideal for smaller events like brunch or dinner parties.

Radisson offers all-inclusive wedding packages, but can also tailor a package to the needs of the wedding party. Skilled chefs create varied, inventive menus which please both the budget and the palate; and staff will plan every single detail of the wedding, if you wish, including music or other entertainment, acting as all-round party planners.

The Radisson Hotel is at 50 East Valhalla Drive in Markham, at the southeast corner of Hwys. 404 & 7. For more information, or to book your wedding, call wedding consultants Susan Muylaert or Lisa Kelso, at (905) 940-5376.

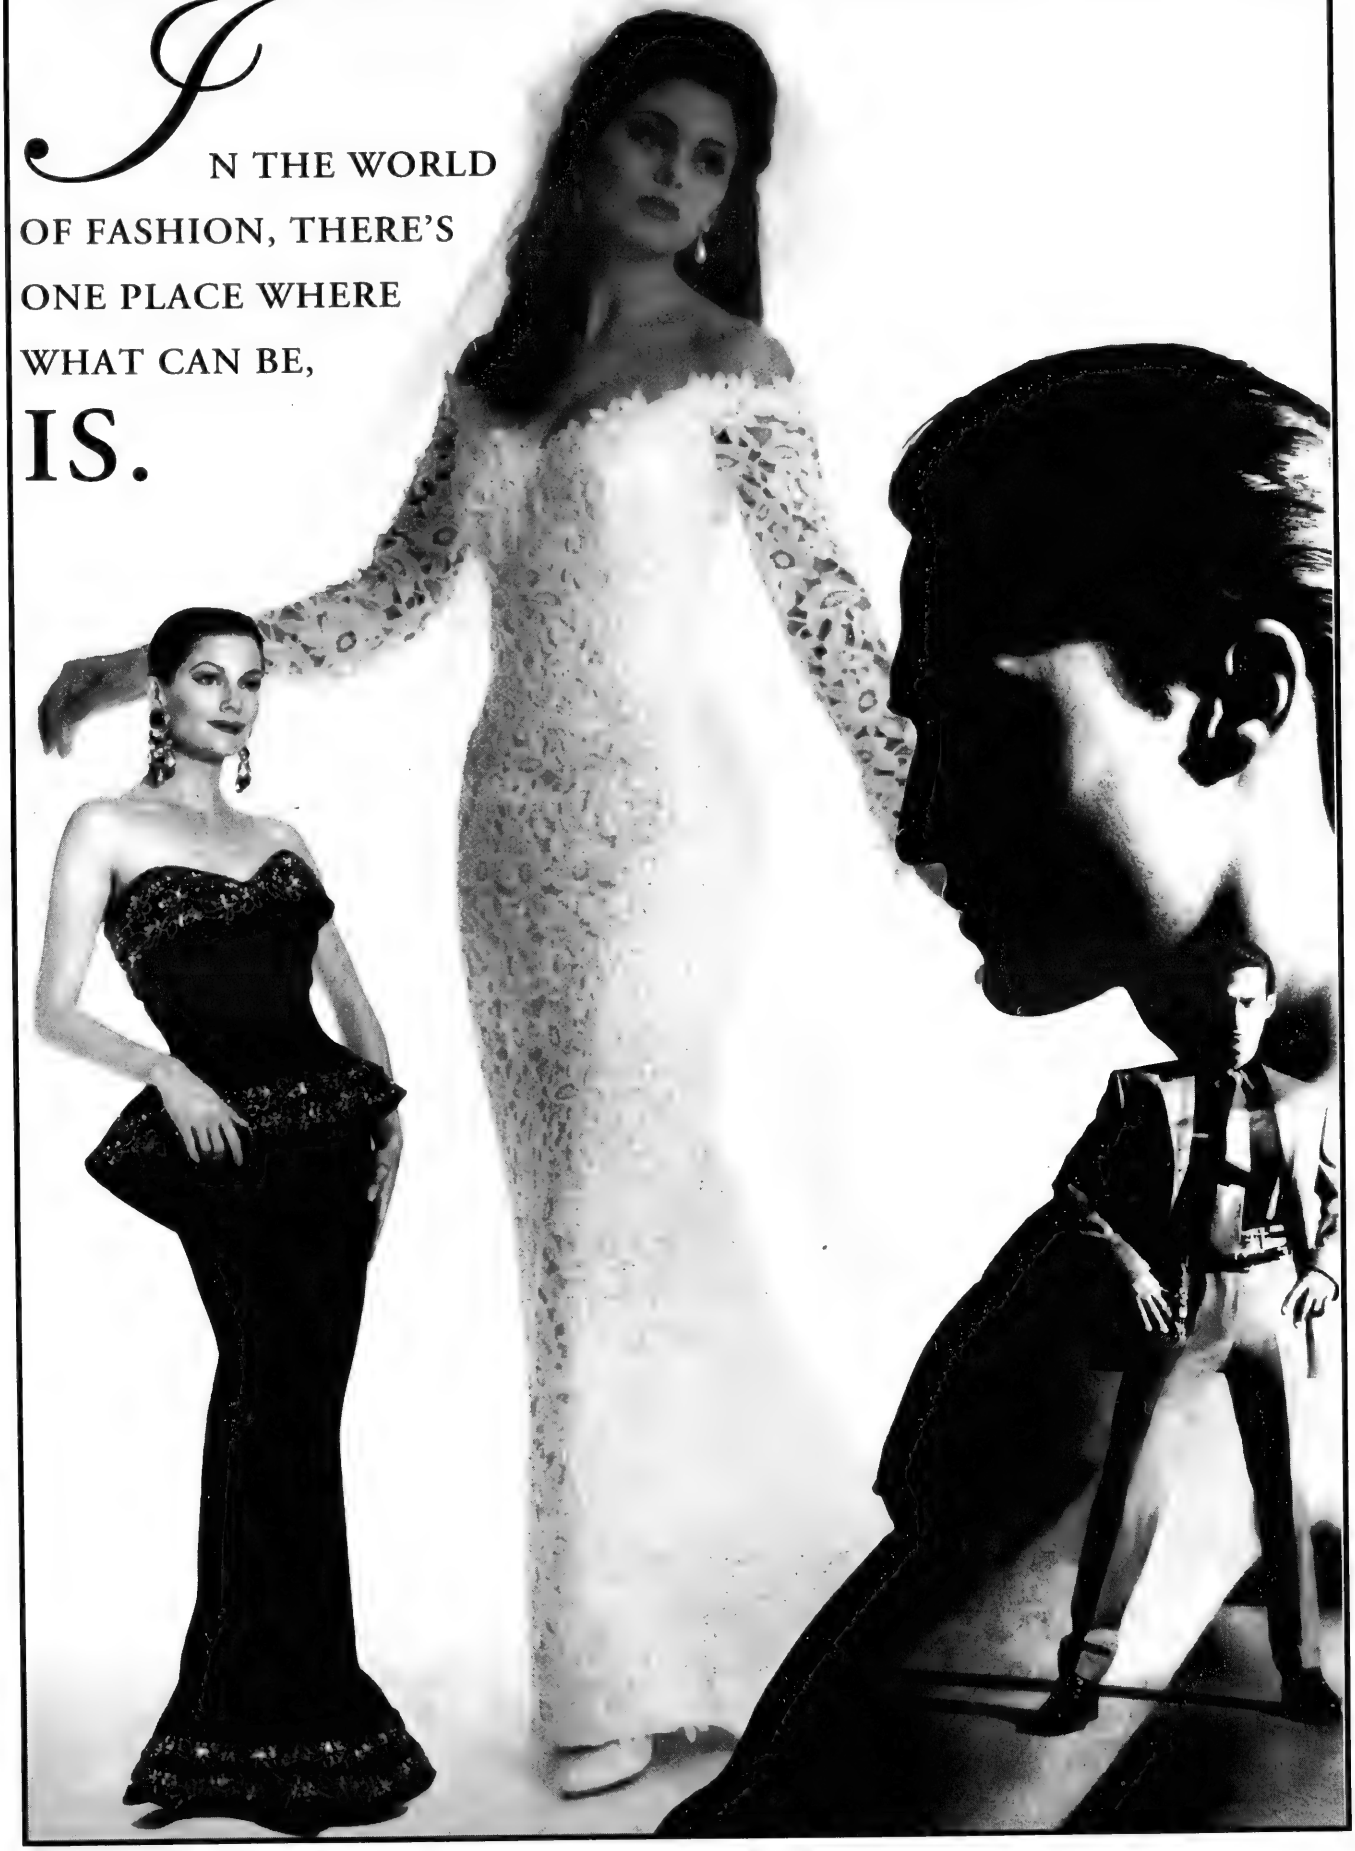
IN THE WORLD OF FASHION, THERE'S ONE PLACE WHERE WHAT CAN BE,

IS.



Welcome to

Having flirted for years with Hazelton Lanes from his neighbouring perch at 33 Avenue Road, Alan Cherry now anchors it with a trio of world-class stores – and he's loving every minute of it. If Hazelton Lanes is Toronto's answer to Fifth Avenue, then it's only fitting that Alan should emerge as its heart and soul.

With his foot firmly planted on the accelerator of life, this nimble sexagenarean has not merely reversed the aging process, he's turned it upside down and shaken it for all it's worth — which in the case of Alan Cherry (his pre-eminent ladies fashion store), Alan Cherry Bridal, Lox Stock and Bagel, and now, Alan Cherry for Men — is considerable coin.

At a time when far younger men are contemplating the downside of their careers, Cherry is busily forging ahead in search of new fashion horizons. Neat to a fault, impeccably groomed, he's the kind of person who cares if his socks are creased. Hardly the sort of preoccupation you'd expect from a kid who grew up over a store in Toronto's tough east end and fought his way up through the hockey ranks to the point where, as a Toronto Marlboro, he was considered a prospect for the Maple Leafs before injury cut short his career. As former teammate and lifelong friend Billy Harris notes in his book The Golden Years, he's "considerably better dressed now" than he was then.

Obsessed with fashion

But not that much better. From "as early as age five", notes Cherry, he was obsessed with fashion. "I can remember my mother dressing me in knickers, which all the kids wore in those days. I was so embarrassed that I would sneak out to the garage, take them off and put on a pair of long pants. When I came home, before going into the house I'd slip into the garage and change back into my knickers." No fool, his mother quickly caught on, but was apparently impressed enough by his fashion resourcefulness to turn a blind eye.

But how was he able to reconcile his penchant for fancy dressing with the values of the rough-and-tumble crowd he ran with? "I wasn't," he smiles. Those who initiated the inevitable physical challenges (being Jewish and different made Cherry an inviting target) quickly learned that the feisty fashion maven's fistic expertise matched his sartorial savvy, and a reputation was born. Cherry witnessed a curious turnaround: neighbourhood kids who'd ridiculed him as a "Fancy Dan" would discreetly pull him aside to seek some fashion advice. Then, as today, he was more than happy to oblige.

"He was different from the word go," says an early coach. "He always marched to his own drummer." The beat goes on: though usually sporting a suit, he's been spotted in a gem-studded jacket that would be the envy of Michael Jackson. "Fashion is an expression of individuality," says Cherry. "Although we've chosen the business suit as our work uniform, there's no law that says we have to wear it twenty-four hours a day."

Christian Dior, exclusive to Alan Cherry Bridal: making dreams come true

World-renowned for his furs, Alan Cherry offers exclusive designs under his own label

The stores, like the man who builds them, are immaculate: nary an imperfection in sight. A notorious "neat freak," Cherry overlooks nothing. A tiny scratch on a window pane? Alan wants it sanded smooth. A fleck of paint missing? Alan wants it recovered. Now, today. His obsession with perfection carries over to the squash court, where he has ranked among Canada' top five seniors players for two decades and won an Olympic bronze medal for Canada in the Masters Olympics held recently in Denmark. (Father Harold was an Olympic cyclist). Alan's competitiveness is legendary; more than one disgruntled opponent has suggested that he should be reclassified in the younger age pool "where he belongs. No one over sixty can be that quick." Young or old, no opponent considers Cherry easy pickings.

Scooping Creeds

His competitiveness in the retail arena has won him many friends, and a few enemies. His penchant for outrageously brilliant promotions has endeared him to shoppers, but not to some merchants who've witnessed the osmosis of shopping dollars from their till to his.

A few memorable incidents spring to mind. Some years ago, when Holt Renfrew opened their doors on Bloor Street, neighbouring Creeds, perhaps edgy at the prospect of competition, suggested that they had they carriage trade and named Alan Cherry as one of the retailers who didn't. Without blinking an eye, Cherry rounded up a fleet of horse-drawn carriages bearing the message "We may not have the carriage trade, but we have carriages to escort you to Alan Cherry for cappucino and biscotti." Cherry's wagon train hit the road, "just happening" to roll up to the front door of Creeds. Before Creeds knew what had hit them, Cherry's equine army had diverted a large portion of their prospective clientele to 711 Yonge Street for the promised capuccino and biscotti – and the odd fur coat. Needless to say, Creeds was not amused.

Then there's the time Cherry decided to "clone" himself ("way before people were even talking about cloning", he interjects) by having lifelike Alan Cherry busts sculpted and placed in his store windows, so he could be there to "personally" greet shoppers. "In squash, I'm all over the court," he says, "so I figured, why not be all over the store too?" Startled shoppers did double takes at the likeness: was it real or was Cherry-all? Only their favourite haberdasher knew for sure.

Noting that women always stopped to admire cats in rustic shop windows, Alan quickly developed a pet project: why not have a cat visit the store every Saturday (shabbos calls?!). Problem: no cozy little window for the cat to curl up in — just big sprawling picture windows. Solution? Get a big cat — say, a 1,400-pound Bengal tiger. ("A little overkill never hurts)," twinkles Cherry.

Voice belies image

For all Cherry's flamboyance, he's a soft-spoken man who rarely raises his voice. "I don't believe in shouting," he says. "I think I'm sensitive to others' feelings, and you can't communicate with people by steamrollering them." His dulcet tones, delivered in an almost Bing-Crosby like croon, coupled with an impish grin and outrageous sense of humour, give him a boyish charm that belies his sixty years.

Remembering the lessons of Special occasion shoppers make a beeline for Alan Cherry

Alan Cherry

teamwork from his Marlie days, Cherry has surrounded himself with a coterie of loyal associates whom he considers family. John Speziale, General Manager of his flagship men's and ladies' store and now General Manager of the 33 Avenue Road store, has been with Cherry for over 20 years. "We're growing young together," says Alan. Maria Arrigo, Vice-President of Alan Cherry Bridal, is new to the Cherry tree but boasts the extensive fashion background that is de rigueur for Cherry associates. "I don't hire salespeople; I work with people — people who love fashion," says Alan. "If you know what you do, and you love what you do, your knowledge and enthusiasm will rub off on the customer."

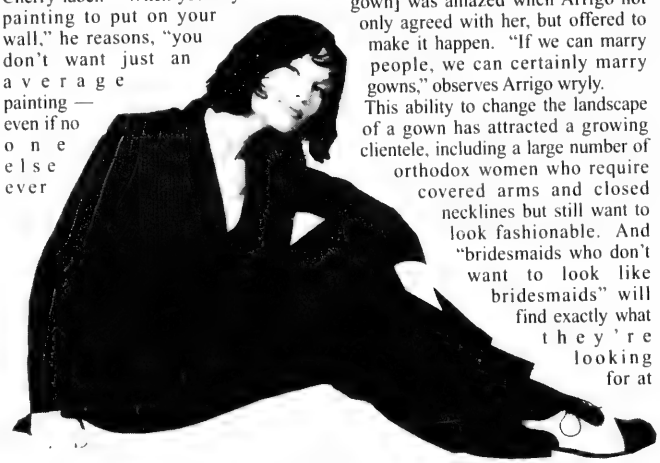
Usually it does. And once you've decided to buy from Alan Cherry, you're treated to a level of service that has become legendary. In the unlikely event you don't find what you need in his shop, Alan will order it for you in almost any size and colour, including the hard-to-find larger sizes, and have it custom-fitted on arrival – even direct from Europe.

Running the marathon

"I don't believe in "can't", he says. "Sometimes people think I'm too demanding, but I only demand of others what I ask of myself. Once a customer walks in your door, they are king or queen. Of all the hundreds of doors they could have walked into at that moment, they've chosen yours. That's significant. That's flattering." To reciprocate the flattery, service at Alan Cherry starts where other stores stop, he says. "Most stores are happy to go the extra mile for their customers; here we run the marathon."

Also flattering is the fact that many of his contemporaries – even competitors – shop at Alan Cherry. Recently, a well-known dress designer who was far too busy preparing her own line to make something special for herself breezed into Alan Cherry and whisked out minutes later with exactly what she wanted. Veteran shoppers who routinely make the rounds of Toronto's finer boutiques have found this to be the rule rather than the exception. Indeed, the notion that "Alan will have it" has become so ingrained in the consciousness of fashion lovers that Alan Cherry is their de facto destination for any kind of special occasion wear.

Another reason shoppers make a beeline for Cherry's shop is the knowledge that an Alan Cherry garment is distinctively different from any other on the market. Watching trends like a hawk, Cherry culls ideas and fabrics from the world over, retools them, embellishes them, and submits them to his European design team with a mandate to produce "an original garment that makes a statement." Many a sample is rejected before it's considered worthy to bear the Alan Cherry label. "When you buy a painting to put on your wall," he reasons, "you don't want just an average painting — even if no one else ever sees it. So why would you dress yourself in an average garment when the rest of the world is watching?"



It's easy to look casually stunning when you shop at Alan Cherry

One big famiglia

At Alan Cherry Bridal, Vice-President Arrigo has reinforced the Cherry credo that co-workers be famiglia by teaming up with designers Nancy DiCroce (whom she lured away from a high-ranking position at an esteemed Italian fashion house) and consultant Sabrina Corrado to offer customers warm personal service in addition to considerable expertise. So close are the trio that they see themselves as a modern version of "Little Women" — though they clearly have an edge over the Louisa May Alcott threesome in the accoutrement department.

In addition to carrying famous designer labels like Jim Hjelm, Carmela Soutera, and Helen Morley (the latter exclusive to Alan Cherry in Canada and "extremely hot", according to Arrigo), Cherry has quietly sewn up the exclusive Canadian rights to the bridal collections of Christian Dior and Guy Laroche.

Arrigo and DiCroce travel regularly to Paris to ferret out the hottest new designs for their ready-to-wear clients, and the finest fabrics for those who prefer custom work. Laces in particular are a Cherry specialty, and Arrigo makes a point of seeking out the most intricate fabrications for incorporation into original designs and for adding finishing touches to ready-to-wear.

Customers who come to Alan Cherry Bridal for fittings and consultations are treated to couturier service in the grand European tradition. Veteran seamstresses are on the floor at all times to work with the bride, pinning, nipping and tucking until the fit is absolutely perfect. Arrigo will even structurally redesign a dress to a client's taste if needed. A customer who remarked wistfully that "If only it [the gown with the bodice she wanted] had that neckline [the neckline of another gown] was amazed when Arrigo not only agreed with her, but offered to make it happen. "If we can marry people, we can certainly marry gowns," observes Arrigo wryly.

This ability to change the landscape of a gown has attracted a growing clientele, including a large number of orthodox women who require covered arms and closed necklines but still want to look fashionable. And "bridesmaids who don't want to look like bridesmaids" will find exactly what they're looking for at Alan Cherry, says Arrigo. Originality and innovation reign supreme, she says: "Why be a step ahead when you can be a hop, skip and a jump ahead?"

The bottom line for Alan Cherry brides is that they rarely have to suffer the embarrassment of seeing the same gown on another woman. Even the accessories are unique: you'll find a dazzling array of headpieces, veils, shoes, jewellery, and undergarments that will make any gown shine.

Everything to suit your taste: Alan Cherry carries "the largest selection of ladies' suits in Toronto" according to General Manager John Speziale

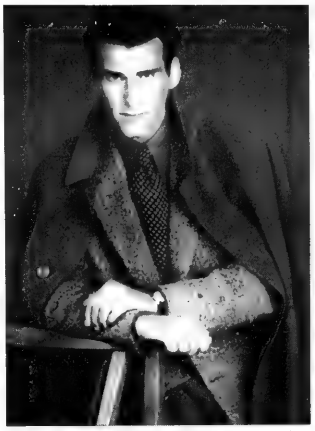
"You knew we'd be back"

So secure is Arrigo in her conviction that a bride can make her dreams come true at Alan Cherry that she actually encourages customers who are undecided to shop around. Almost invariably, she says, they return sheepishly a week later saying, "You knew we'd be back, didn't you"? Usually, they tell her, they found at least one wonderful dress in each of the other salons they visited, but at Alan Cherry "you have so many of them."

The environment, in the finest Cherry tradition, is as breathtaking as the gowns it ensconces. Italian marble floors merge strikingly with antique furniture, while mirrors with gilded, imported Venetian frames add to the palatial aura. The bride takes centre stage under a hand-painted, frescoed cupola mounted on Italian marble columns.

In Alan Cherry's original store at 33 Avenue Road, mothers-of-the-bride — and any woman searching for the perfect special occasion dress — are treated to equally compelling originality in both fashion and architecture. The store is divided into several charming enclaves. The upstairs portion of the store consists of four connected but distinct areas for suits, dresses, coats, and accessories. The downstairs houses the fur salon, where you'll find everything from the most exquisite Italian black glama mink coats to the most unusual sheared beaver coats and jackets. "Ninety percent" of the merchandise in the store bears the Alan Cherry label, says General manager John Speziale. "We take great pride in our label, and women take pride in wearing it. They

"I don't believe in 'can't' "



Allan "couldn't wait to get back into the men's wear business" to offer customers ensembles like this know they're getting something they won't find anywhere else," he adds, since these garments are "designed expressly for Alan Cherry."

Always an innovator, Cherry introduced Hugo Boss and Giorgio Armani to Canada, and watched their merchandise fly off his shelves before other men's wear stores followed suit. Now, some three years after relocating to his ladies-only store at 33 Avenue Road, he's back in the men's wear business "because I missed it." It, apparently, missed him too. "I couldn't believe how many men called me or came up to me in the street and said, "Alan, we want you back. Men's wear is no fun any more," he grins. "There's a special kind of camaraderie that develops on the sales floor. I missed the excitement of having my personal taste reaffirmed, and I missed the kibbitzing."

Aiding and abetting Cherry in his men's wear venture is Santo De Rose, who brings to the table some twenty years' experience in men's retail and, according to Cherry, has "excellent taste and is easy to work with." De Rose offers the very latest men's fashions from Ferre, Lubiam, Marco Azzali and Zegna, among others, as well as the Alan Cherry private label. Made-to-measure suits "in the most luxurious fabrics" are available for the ordering, and the shop carries a large selection of tuxedos to complement the bridal salon next door. Since opening September 1, De Rose has been "run off my feet" by clients eager to celebrate the return of Alan Cherry to the men's wear arena.

"No restauranteur, but ..."

Last but not least, the unprecedented success of Lox, Stock and Bagel in Hazelton Lanes underscores Cherry's uncanny knack for picking winners. Undaunted by a string of failures experienced by other restaurants in the very same location, Cherry cheerfully signed a long-term lease, and within days of opening, had his New York style deli humming to rave reviews and lineups that have not abated since. Though Cherry readily admits that "I'm no restauranteur," he saw a niche for casual, healthy dining and, encouraged by the success of his original Lox Stock location on Eglinton, moved quickly to fill the void. "There was a need for a restaurant where people could relax and be themselves, bring their children, that wasn't being fulfilled in Hazelton Lanes at the time," he says. Lox Stock has now taken over the outdoor patio in centre court, and has become a favourite spot for relaxing and meeting friends for a meal or a drink.

Another factor in Lox Stock's success is Hazelton Lanes' policy of offering customers two hours' free parking with a $10 purchase. Many shoppers are delighted to discharge their parking obligations by stocking up on Alan's baked goodies, like the seven-grain bread he consumes daily and the coffee cake and rugelach (eleven varieties) he loves but avoids "as much as possible" in order to stay in fighting trim on the squash court. "If I ate all the goodies on my menu, my opponents would eat me for breakfast," he says.

That other Cherry

Speaking of sports, Cherry smiles when asked if he's ever had any communication with the "other" Cherry, Don, of Boston Bruins and Hockey Night in Canada fame. "He called me last year. He said, "Cherry, I want a raccoon coat wholesale. I'm related to you."

Though this fashion/food visionary usually presses the right buttons, he's not always right. "Fifteen years ago, [NHL player agent] Gus Badali came to me and said he had a hot young prospect that could promote my store if I gave him a few of my suits," Cherry relates. "I told him I was interested, but when I saw the kid, he was so skinny and scrawny that I just didn't think he fitted the image of my store."

The kid's name? Wayne Gretzky. Cherry recently encountered The Great One on a visit to Centro, and Gretzky was quick to remind Cherry of his boo-boo.

Though he's built up a thick skin in the retail and athletic wars, Cherry admits to a vulnerable side that few people see. "What really hurts," he says, is the notion espoused by some that he's merely a cocky promoter with a green thumb. "I've worked hard all my life," he says. "I eat, sleep and breathe this business [of fashion]. I'm a slave to it as much as any man is to his job." The wacky promotions that have rubbed some competitors the wrong way "especially back then, not so much today" were merely his way of advertising, he contends. "While they were complaining about my methods, they were spending just as much if not more on mainstream advertising. I never told anyone else how to run their business, what to promote or what not to promote," he continues. "You do your thing, I'll do my thing, and if we meet at Lox Stock, it's beautiful."

Less known than Cherry's business acumen is the fact that he's formally trained in fashion and design, having studied at Gallasos Institute and the Ontario College of Art, and has considerable input not only into the designs of his private label garments, but also into the architecture of the stores that house them. "Clothing, like architecture, tells a story," he says. "Whether it's the room you walk into or the outfit you wear, it says something. My stores and my outfits aren't neutral, because I'm not neutral. I have something to say."

The fashion cognoscenti are all ears. Having written his share of chapters in an extraordinary family clothing saga that now spans seven decades, Cherry is comfortable in the knowledge that when his customers need a special dress or suit, they also have something to say.

"Alan will have it."

Canoe is vintage Oliver and Bonacini in room with a view

A ground-level perspective of Bay and Wellington Streets reveals little but concrete and glass, but a quick jaunt up the TD Tower to Peter Oliver and Michael Bonacini's new Canoe opens up new vistas for the eyes and the palate.

Celebrating our Canadian heritage and landscape in both theme and menu, this eclectically-decorated 54th floor dining room resembles a canoe in its long streamlined shape and in the elliptically shaped benches which flank some 300 feet of window space, affording Toronto's most spectacular view to date. Though Oliver insists that "the view is secondary," you simply have to see it. High enough to reveal the whole broad sweep of Lake Ontario, yet low enough to allow you to almost reach out and touch the Toronto Harbour, Island and Airport, it reminds one of the cliff scene overlooking the Saguenay River in Black Robe, where real Indians paddled.

Canoe shrugs off uniformity in a variety of table shapes and surfaces, some clothed, some not. Floors and ceilings marry diverse elements and textures of wood and stone to echo, in a modern setting, the diversity of the Canadian shield. Pale pine ceiling panels coexist happily with oak floor panels in a raised portion of the dining room, while polished concrete flooring reflects exposed ceiling ducts in the larger area that runs along the windows. It's a striking mélange that could only be the work of Yabu Pushelberg — and is.

The menu reiterates that we need look no further afield than our own shores to find world-class cuisine. The word "authentic", so overworked on the restaurant scene, really rings true here: Canoe doesn't just talk Canadian, it cooks Canadian. Underscoring this are excerpts from the Special Occasion Menu: halibut is steamed over northern pine needles; Alberta red beef, hay roasted; quail, home smoked and served on wild rice and blueberry risotto with natural pan juices. Even the desserts, such as maple syrup and navy rum rice pudding, breathe Canada from every pore.

Well prior to its official Sept. 21 opening, Canoe has already booked several bar mitzvahs, weddings, and corporate functions. Favourable advance publicity has helped, as has the Oliver/Bonacini reputation. In an era when cuisine often plays second fiddle to "concept", the Oliver/Bonacini formula works because it starts with a commitment to good food. And the prices are eminently reasonable: Special Function menus range from $39 per person for a three-course meal that anyone would be proud to serve to $78 per person for a seven-course bonanza.

Kosher catering can be arranged on request for those who wish it.

Canoe is open to the public Monday to Friday, with Saturday and Sunday reserved for functions. You can reserve the entire restaurant, which seats 180, or the private dining room and lounge, which seats 50 for a sit-down dinner or 75 for a standup cocktail reception.

Fine food and ambience are the cornerstones of any restaurant, and it's refreshing to find one that accomplishes both with Canoe-like dexterity.

Mina takes down-to-earth approach to Haute Couture

Brides who don't know what they want are dreaded at some salons, but at Mina Haute Couture they're welcomed with open arms.

"With so many gowns out there to choose from, says designer Mina Pizzitelli, "you can't reasonably expect everyone to know exactly what they want at first blush." In her cozy salon at 1898 Avenue Road, Pizzitelli uses her considerable expertise as a fashion designer to assist brides in determining which styles are most suitable. Pizzitelli prefers to offer the bride something that captures her personality as opposed to shoehorning her into a gown that may look wonderful in a magazine but considerably less compelling when subjected to a real-world test.

Making liberal use of imported silk peau-de-soie, silk dupioni and guipure lace as well as hand embroidering, beadwork and pleating, Pizzitelli is known for creating highly detailed wedding and other special occasion gowns that have considerable drama without excessive fabric and frills. People are still talking about the show-stopping fuschia-and-black evening gown she created for a major fashion show some ten years ago! Fortified by a decade of experience, she's acquired a reputation for being an innovative designer who takes her work very seriously without taking herself too seriously. Customers find her easy to work with and always willing to listen to their suggestions.

For those who prefer ready-to-wear, Pizzitelli has some 40 styles in her showroom to choose from, and though she works mainly by appointment, customers are always free to drop in unannounced. A custom gown at Mina's starts with a true canvas fitting and proceeds through three or more additional fittings as needed. Prices for her original designs start at $1000, including fabrics.

More than her design expertise, Mina prides herself on being approachable and willing to work within a client's budget. "Many customers have told me that working with me was a good experience, as opposed to the bad experiences they'd had elsewhere," she says. "Knowing someone feels comfortable dealing with me is as important as knowing that they look great in their gown."

Suits are a Pizzitelli forté, and many clients rely on her for their bar/bat mitzvah and other special occasion needs. Mother-of-the bride outfits are also a specialty. Her loyal clientele has followed her from her original Markham Street location to her second location at Bayview and Eglinton, and now to 1898 Avenue Road, where she looks forward to serving them for many years to come.

Perfection at affordable prices

Questions you should ask when booking a videographer:

How long has he been in business? Is this his full-time profession? Will he use the latest equipment? Does he have his own professional editing suite? Does he have spare equipment in case of breakdowns? Will he keep his lighting equipment to a minimum? Can he keep the camera steady so the video will not be shaky, or must he achieve steadiness by keeping the camera on a tripod away from the action? Does he realize that sound is as important as video? Does he have reliable wireless microphones? Will he not interfere with you or your guests? Will he do exactly what you want? Is he reliable? Is he creative? Does he have a friendly personality? Will he be well-groomed and well-dressed? Does he guarantee his work?

At Video Affairs, the answer to all these questions is yes, which is why Video Affairs has become a leader in wedding video production.

If you've already shopped around, you know that a professional video can cost anywhere from $1300 to $2,000. At Video Affairs, you will receive a truly memorable, professional video without the high cost.

Why people choose Video Affairs:

At Video Affairs, you are in charge of your video production, from start to finish. You will be given helpful creative input from our professional staff, starting from the original camerawork right through the entire editing process, in order for you to achieve the exact video you are looking for. Yes, that's right! You are invited to be present during the entire editing process, and are able to choose for yourself from the many different types of effects, three-dimensional inserts, music, etc. . . Or take a copy of all the footage home with you and make specific notes which will be followed exactly as indicated.

Where else can you get professional quality with perfect detail, color and creativity at an affordable price?

Services include:

Outside view of simcha location, inside view of sanctuary, decorations, reception hall, head table, flowers and cake before guests arrive, witnesses signing Ketubah, Kabalat Panim or bedecking, entire ceremony, cocktails and hors d'oeuvres, candid close-ups, many camera angles (not just tripod view), special precision editing, direct microphone for video (no annoying noise at speeches), Hamotzi, all speeches, dancing, cake cutting, complete table shots, interviews, sweet table, garter or bouquet, and goodbye scene.

All of the above is now available to you for only $995.00, completely edited.

Inès Gordi teaches old gowns new tricks

Want to recreate the old-fashioned romance of yesteryear? To enter the synagogue as if you're walking out of the pages of a Victorian novel, or stepping out of an elegant black-and-white still shot from the 'forties? With Inès Gordi's help, you can.

In her native Moscow, Gordi was a structural engineer by day and a fashion designer by night. When she decided to devote herself entirely to fashion, her engineering skills were put to good use in the often complex garments she painstakingly designed.

The results of her labours can be viewed in her new showroom at 341 Eglinton Avenue West, which she recently opened after three years at Village on the Grange.

Restoring old gowns

Gordi is a restoration specialist, meaning she can take older garments and rework, recolour, reshape, and even totally redesign them into a brand new garment that retains all of the positive features of the old and none of the negative. Many clients react with disbelief when they see the "after" version of a "before" dress, suit or skirt they were about to discard when they heard about Gordi's ability to make silk purses out of sow's ears. According to Gordi, no job is too challenging for her to undertake.

"I take on the repair jobs other shops turn down," she exclaims. For example, most repair shops can take an oversized garment and reduce it to fit, but Gordi is one of the very few restoration artists — perhaps the only one — who will take an undersized garment and take it up a size or two (gowns often shrink during storage) by adding fabric so skillfully that you'll never know it's been altered. She uses the finest Italian and Belgian pure cotton silks and best quality dyes, so the quality and integrity of the finished product matches or exceeds that of the original. Her work is characterized by the intricate use of antique lace, subtle colouring, and impeccable finishing.

A fraction of the cost

The result is a brand new made-to-order dress at a fraction of the cost of a conventional new dress. This is high-fashion recycling of the highest order; among Gordi's clientele are singers and performers who have her dye the same dress a different colour for each performance! Prices range from $50 for a simple dyeing job, to $100 for a typical neckline alteration, on up to $1,000 and more for full reproductions; but most renewals are in the $200 – $400 range.

Repair and restoration is only half of what Gordi does. She designs original suits and gowns, and boasts a stunning ready-to-wear collection that is sold not only in her own showroom but also in Italy. Some items featuring the interplay of various fabrics are actually fashioned from discarded bolts and ends of lots; she traces her ability to "make ends meet" all the way back to her days as an eight-year-old Muscovite, when she first put needle to thread and made patchwork creations from whatever meagre fabrics came to hand.

You may not be able to teach an old dog new tricks, but Gordi will have your guests jumping through hoops to find out where you got your beautiful "new" gown.

Roksolana's flair for fabrics means many compelling choices

In her quaint salon at 2250A Bloor Street West, Roksolana has solidified her reputation as one of Toronto's most resourceful bridal designers by offering clients an unusually wide range of fabric choices for their wedding and special occasion needs.

It was, in fact, Roksolana's fascination with fabric that attracted her to couture in the first place. During and following her formal fashion training at Ryerson, she busied herself with studying every aspect of fabrics: their origins, their textures, colourings, durability, how they interplay with one another.

The examples of her work illustrated here attest to her ability to bring out the best in fabrics. Above, Italian (Como) silk/wool blend jacket with Italian silk satin full-legged, high-waisted pant. Opposite, tailored Italian peau de soie jacket with shawl collar and pure Italian silk satin floral print organza skirt. Below left, pure French silk pané velvet dress with draped collar and detachable silk organza train. Below right, pure French silk pané velvet bodice with silk chiffon skirt.

Further enhancing Roksolana's appeal is her policy of hand-cutting all patterns and her willingness to schedule several fittings in order to ensure a perfect fit. Because of her versatility, it's impossible to pigeonhole her style; it might best be described as customized, tailored fitting with a European flair.

Despite her lofty styling and lavish attention to detail, Roksolana's prices for couture creations are extremely approachable: wedding gowns start at $900, cocktail and other special occasion dresses and suits at $500. This includes all fabrics and labour, and Roksolana spares no pains to ensure your experience is pleasant, from the initial consultation through the final fitting.

With so many points on the plus side of her résumé, it's not surprising that the services of this enterprising designer are increasingly in demand for bridal and evening wear.

In a short period of time, Nu-Rhythm has become the hottest band on the Wedding and Bar-Mitzvah circuit. If you want your guests to get up and dance, then Nu-Rhythm is definately the band to hire.

Led by Isaac Oziel, Nu-Rhythm's dynamic music program extends from the early Big Band sound and Rock 'N Roll to the most modern current music of 1995. "We customize our music selection to suit your party guests. Every affair is different and we pride ourselves on pleasing every client."

Nu-Rhythm's standard group size is 8 pieces with 2 soundmen to control sound levels and do the proper mixing. The band features fabulous singers that provide exciting performances throughout the party.

What sets this band apart is the high energy and enthusiasm which they generate and project to the party guests. "Our goal is to make your simcha the best party in town," says Oziel.

HAZELTON LANES • 87 AVENUE RD. • 416-923-7003

Conway & Gower offers personal service and wide selection of gifts

When you register at Conway and Gower you can look forward to personal service and a wide selection of elegant gifts.

Specialists in everything for the dining-room — except the food — Conway and Gower offers competitive prices whether you are looking for candles and napkins to enhance your table setting or a complete dining-room.

The bridal registry service is designed for the discriminating couple who would like a wide and interesting choice of gifts. Brides can choose from such pieces as antique silver serving dishes and cutlery.

Cumbria crystal, the choice of the British embassies is one of the many exclusive imports by Conway and Gower and fine china, both British and European is displayed throughout the shop.

A good selection of Irish and French linens in standard and large sizes is always available and custom orders are a specialty. Oil paintings, watercolours and prints ranging from $60 — $12,000 are available. Special cabinet work is also undertaken.

Conway and Gower offers a discount of 10% on all purchases from the wedding list made before the wedding and in addition, it gives the couple a gift on their wedding day and on their first anniversary.

The staff at Conway and Gower takes the time to work with brides to design a wedding list with a range of gifts large enough to allow guests to select the perfect gift within their price range. They know that guests appreciate guidance in what the newlyweds would like for their new home, and there is no better way of helping them than by registering a wedding list

Every piece chosen by the bride is entered into a computer and as soon as a purchase is made, it is recorded to avoid duplication. Lists, which are held for one year after the wedding or even longer if desired, can be amended at anytime even after the wedding day. Brides are kept up-to-date on the status of the list and are promptly advised if further items should be added.

Gifts are wrapped, stored and delivered at no extra charge in the Toronto area and can be delivered worldwide. To assist out-of-town guests, phone and mail orders are accepted.

The store is located in Hazelton Lanes on the upper level near the 87 Avenue Road entrance. Hours of opening are 10 a.m.-6 p.m. Monday—Saturday, 10 a.m.-8 p.m. on Thursday, and 12 noon-5 p.m. on Sunday, For more information please call (416) 923-7003.

Beauty is Reality ...

This is the philosophy at Marc Anthony. Marc Anthony, at the age of 19, was selected to represent Canada in the World Championship in Germany (1988).

Marc Anthony, in the following year received rave reviews as being the youngest in history to win the World Supreme Championship in Los Angeles.

Marc Anthony astounded the hair industry by winning the Ontario Championship back-to-back in 1990-1991 and Marc Anthony continued to extend his naturally gifted talents, by opening his first emporium in 1992.

With the incredible support of his mother and sister, he managed to return to the stage in 1993, to win the 2-time International Championship in Dallas.

Marc Anthony with his commitment to the industry and his burning desire to make beauty a reality for everyone, continued to introduce another emporium in 1994 located in Woodbridge.

Detail was not a luxury but a necessity for Marc Anthony. The variables to make beauty a reality were great. During 1992, Marc Anthony, well aware of the impact of hair products, began his quest to work side-by-side with a chemist. Listening to the ongoing concerns of his customers for hair care, Marc Anthony was determined to develop a hair care system which would meet the needs of the people. With the assistance of his team, testing, and reformulating, the Marc Anthony Professional Hair Care System was released in 1993.

Education being at the forefront, Marc Anthony personally trained his entire team on the hair care system, to ensure complete customer satisfaction. The line since then, has been exclusive at all the Marc Anthony emporiums.

The integrity of the Marc Anthony philosophy has continued to flourish with the latest addition to the emporiums on Avenue Road in June 1995. Fully equipped for complete spa, and hair services, this latest addition to the Marc Anthony facilities, provides an ambiance yet seen in the Toronto area. With the extraordinary spa on Avenue Rd., Marc Anthony complimented this gala opening with the introduction of Marc Anthony Cosmetics.

The Marc Anthony Cosmetics, which are completely in line with today's fashons, provide colours and textures which will completely complement and enhance natural beauty.

The latest move for Marc Anthony is the introduction of the premium quality hair products and cosmetics in Shoppers Drug Mart at 3089 Dufferin St. in September. This move is in conjunction with both Shopeprs Drug Mart and the Marc Anthony philosophy to increase the availability of Professional Hair Products and Cosmetics, and making beauty a reality.

Beauty is Reality

One-on-one design

Tomè Haute Couture is a custom design boutique where owner Thomas Koichopolos, himself a designer, creates a unique look to suit each client. Every client who comes to Tomè Haute Couture is different, therefore her apparel must reflect this. Thomas works with every style from conservative to daring, from demure to flamboyant. "I love fabric, and I love people," he says; "every moment is interesting, every design a new challenge."

Thomas and his staff create a wide range of apparel: daywear, after-5 suits, sportswear, evening wear, ensembles and bridal gowns. There are 40 samples of evening, day and bridal wear on display so clients can see Thomas' quality craftsmanship.

Recently, Thomas spent 2 1/2 months creating a spectacular one-of-a-kind "Swan Gown" which will be featured in September on the cover of Sposa Magazine. He also designed an eclectic group of garments for the Toronto Women in Film and Television Festival which was held September 10.

Thomas' bridal gowns can have a contemporary or traditional look; many are seasonally inspired. He uses the best fabrics (peau de soie or Duppioni silk) imported from around the world and often uses clusters of pearls combined with plenty of rosettes and embroidery in plush colours. Off-white is a popular colour for bridal gowns. Accessories, veils and headpieces can also be custom made.

Expert seamstresses and sample makers, many with 25 years' experience are always on hand to ensure that every garment meets the high standards of a Tomè Haute Couture design.

Accreditation from the International Academy of Fashion Design in Toronto combined with 10 years of design experience have earned Thomas a loyal following of staff and clients to his Avenue Road location.

Tomè Haute Couture will be participating in the Wedding Perfections Show, October 9 and 10 at the Paradise Banquet Hall and at the CNE Bridal Show in the Automotive Building, Exhibition Place February 9-11, 1996.

Throughout September, clients can purchase custom made suits with personal 1-on-1 attention to design, from $500, on selected fabrics. Tomè Haute Couture is located at 1850 Avenue Rd. at Old Orchard, (north of Lawrence). Telephone (416) 256-5852.

Encore, food with elegance gets rave reviews

Since 1979, Encore has been the preferred caterer among Toronto's discerning event planners. Bringing 16 years' experience to the table, Encore foresees and oversees every aspect of your simcha, be it an intimate gathering for 30 guests, or an all-out gala for 3,000.

Encore has provided full-service catering for prestigious venues like the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, Pantages Theatre, Roy Thomson Hall and St. Lawrence Hall, and corporations such as Live Ent., Canada Trust, Ronald McDonald Children's Charities, Telemedia, the Hospital for Sick Children and CFRB Radio.

Moreover, Encore has a strong presence in the community, as preferred caterer at Temple Sinai, Holy Blossom Temple, Temple Har Zion and Temple Emanu-El.

For 9 years, Encore has been exclusive caterer for the Richmond Hill Country Club. The Club offers guests a country setting near the city, where they can escape noise and bustle, breathe fresh air and look out over a green landscape. Here, the newly renovated Bridal Room offers space for up to 300 guests and comfortable function rooms. For intimate events like showers or luncheons, smaller rooms are also available.

Encore also has a great deal of experience in catering home events such as weddings, garden parties and showers.

Your guests will enjoy the exquisite cuisine Encore takes pride in offering, from traditional favourites to inspired new creations. Menus are researched and tailored to your desires and budget.

Encore creates a relaxed atmosphere, so that you will enjoy your wedding or other simcha to the fullest. Partner Cary Silber points out that catering is not a matter of food alone; the dictionary defines "to cater" as to serve someone's needs."

To make your event an all-round success where everything proceeds according to plan and budget, Encore will advise you on every aspect from entertainment to decor. Innovative planning and presentation, the highest standards in food quality and service, and competitive pricing, ensure that Encore events get rave reviews from you and your guests.

"None of us is as good as all of us," Silber adds. Encore's staff are competent professionals, who also work together as a team.

Encore treats every simcha as a unique event, approaching it with fresh ideas and exciting new options. To book and plan your event, call Cary Silber at (416) 661-4460, 62 Magnetic Dr., Downsview.

Richmond Hill Country Club is located at 8905 Bathurst St., near Hwy. #7; (905) 731-2800.

Your guests love when we cater.

For over fifteen years, Encore Food with Elegance has been entrusted with catering and event planning at some of the most important celebrations in people's lives. From old favourites to inspired new creations, from intimate home parties to grand affairs, Encore approaches each occasion with fresh ideas and exciting new menu choices.

BRIDAL EXPERTS FOR OVER 40 YEARS

Ritché. The name has come to mean "beautiful bride". For over 40 years, three generations of Canadian brides have had the Ritché family assist them with the most important decision of their bridal attire.

After receiving his fashion training in Europe, Jack Ritché came to Canada, quickly establishing himself as a leading couturier designer. In the years that followed he has outfitted international and local celebrities and thousands of brides from across the country.

In 1981, his daughter Vivian joined the family business, and soon after the Ritchés expanded, adding the present Avenue Road location. Today with her husband Arthur, they operate two successful bridal salons. Jack Ritché is still personally attending customers and designing dresses for brides and mothers.

The spacious three level Avenue Road store features an entire floor of wedding dresses. Brides choose from exciting Ritché Original Designs in fine fabrics and laces from around the world, and from the best selection of Canadian and International designers. From simple to elaborate, traditional to contemporary, Ritché has a style to suit each bride's needs and every wedding theme.

Relaxing in private consultation rooms, brides select confidently with the assistance of the friendly and knowledgeable consultants.

On the main floor, mothers, bridesmaids, flowergirls and wedding guests can browse through a wide selection of special occasion dresses, suits and accessories.

After 40 years, Ritché's motto remains... "Where brides' dreams come true."

Amandalina's as romantic as it sounds

"My most brilliant achievement was my ability to persuade my wife to marry me"
— Winston Churchill

Weddings are the stuff that dreams are made of. Having seen many "castles in the sky" become reality in his sixteen years in the bridal business, Sam Pollari thought it might be a good idea to build one. Unable to secure a building permit for air space, however, he decided to build his castle on Steeles instead. (Don't we all?)

Sam and his wife Rachelle, also a veteran of the bridal business, spent long hours transforming a large but unassuming retail space into a castle-like environment complete with mini-moat, turrets and a picture window from which to view their "kingdom." Their goal was to create an old-world atmosphere replete with romance, which the Pollaris believe is still the essence of the bridal spirit. (If an Italian man and a French woman don't know about love and romance, who does?)

This theme is stressed in Amandalina's promotional literature as well. Each page of their fall bridal brochure features a romantic gown accompanied by a charming epithet about the virtues of love. Some of these little gems are reprinted here.

While acknowledging the current trend towards simpler, more sophisticated gowns, Sam says "the romantic look is not dead by any means. Love and romance are still the number one reasons for getting married, last time I heard."

To cater to the full spectrum of bridal tastes, Amandalina's (named after the Pollari's second child) carries a fabulous selection of gowns in their 1,500 square foot mezzanine-level showroom, accessed via a semi-spiral staircase. They also have all the accessories you'll need to go with the gown: shoes, veils, headpieces, gloves, and jewellery. On the main floor, even larger at 2,800 square feet, you'll find a tasteful collection of suits and cocktail dresses for the mother-of-the bride.

"A successful marriage requires falling in love many times, always with the same person" — Mignon McLaughlin

"Love is friendship set on fire" — Jeremy Tayloy

In keeping with the castle theme, the Pollaris wanted to make Amandalina's a welcoming place where brides could come and shop in a relaxed atmosphere. To that end, they decided against working by appointment only. "We're happy to arrange appointments with anyone who wants one, but compulsary appointments sometimes create pressure," says Sam. "Many of our customers drop in at their leisure to see what we've got, then book an appointment when they're ready. We don't want to put our wedding gowns on a pedestal; we want our customers to be able to reach out and touch them."

To further facilitate your visit, Amandalina's has a separate children's play room complete with large-screen TV and plenty of toys to keep the little tykes occupied while you shop.

Rachelle, a fashion design graduate of Sheridan college, brings to the business several years of high-level experience in both the bridal and the cosmetic industries, giving her a broad overview of a bride's needs. Brides also enjoy working with her because of her easygoing attitude. "We prefer to convey a feeling of comfort rather than an aura of exclusivity," says Rachelle. "We carry the top designer lines, as do many other stores. But very few other stores can offer you such a large selection to examine at your leisure."

Amandalina's carries some of the top names in bridal and evening wear. Prices range from $300 to $2000 for cocktail dresses and from $700 to $4000 for wedding gowns. They're happy to custom fit your gown, and will also custom design a dress for you if that is your preference.

Since opening in June, Amandalina's has been extremely gratified with the response to their "open concept." "People always make better decisions when they're relaxed," says Sam. "There's enough pressure associated with the wedding process without the vendor adding to it."

Located at 4040 Steeles Avenue West, in what has come to be known as "The Bridal Mall" (virtually all tenants are bridal-related), Amandalina's is a ten-minute drive from north Toronto, twenty to thirty minutes from downtown. Parking is ample and free, and at Amandalina's, love is definitely in the air.

A TIMELESS MARCH Shai Spetgang

"Let us now relate the power of this day's holiness, for it is awesome and frightening. You are the one who judges, proves, knows, and bears witness...who remembers all that was forgotten... and a great shofar will be sounded but a still, small voice will be heard..."
(Rosh Hashanah Machzor)

'The still small voice'

Editorial

It must have been both pitiful and awe-inspiring: the tearful, heart-rending sight of Rabbi Amnon of Mainz, bleeding, dying from his barbaric wounds, breathing his last breath and crying forth in front of the entire congregation on Rosh Hashanah, the words of the prayer U'netaneh tokef. Legend says that Rabbi Amnon appeared three days later in a dream to Kalonymous ben Meshullam, taught him the prayer and pleaded with him to ensure its use by the generations to come. Rabbi Kalonymous obliged the suffering soul.

The prayer is an emotional cry from the heart. Along with the wail and the sigh of the shofar's sounds, it forms the stirring centrepiece of the Rosh Hashanah service. In simple, melancholy poetry, it expresses the uncertainty and the vulnerability of the human condition and acknowledges God's ultimate authority over all forms of life.

Alas, the prayer was also destined to serve as a form of rallying call, a source of strength and even of inspiration for the Jewish people who, shortly after Rabbi Amnon's death, would suffer terrible cruelties at the hands of marauding Crusader armies.

The verses excerpted elsewhere on this page are from Rabbi Amnon's prayer. We have chosen them to punctuate the accompanying photograph, which photographer Shai Spetgang described as "the reflection of a row of Israeli flags leading the Canadian contingent of the March of the Living in 1994 from Auschwitz to Birkenau." Spetgang has entitled his photo A Timeless March. How profoundly fitting.

The photo deftly captures in the briefest instant of light and movement, the strength, the determination and the resilience of the Jewish people – a people whose very existence is indeed a timeless march through human history.

Shimmering through the reflected light in the panes of the window, the Stars of David are borne aloft on the shoulders of the grandchildren of those who were able to walk or be carried alive away from that decaying mortar and ugly brick. The shining, waving flags between the mortar and the brick are the embodiment of a people, the symbol of return, "the still, small voice" which, through the thunder and the cloud of uncertain events, has always emerged onto the stage of its destiny.

As we celebrate the arrival of a new year, and contemplate the thunder and cloud of uncertain events swirling around the household of Israel disturbing the unity of our people, may we be guided and inspired by the words of Rabbi Abraham Isaac Hacohen Kook, of blessed memory, to move forward together on our timeless march through human history, striving constantly for its betterment.

"Hearken, my people.
From the very depths of my soul
I speak to you.

From the core of life where lies the tie
That binds us one to the other,
With devotion, deep and profound,
I declare unto you

That you, each one of you,
All of you, the whole of you,
Your very souls, your generations,
... are the essence of my life."

Shanah tovah.

The News In Brief
Everywhere

CANADA

Bosnians Coming

VANCOUVER — At least one Jewish family will be heading to British Columbia as Canada opens its doors to an additional 500 refugees from war-torn Bosnia, the Western Jewish Bulletin reported recently.

According to Vancouver's Jewish Family Service Agency, one — possibly two — Jewish families from Bosnia will be relocated in Victoria, the paper added.

New Police Unit

VANCOUVER — This city's police department has set up a "community diversity relations section," which will examine how ethnocultural communities are policed.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, welcomed the unit's creation and has offered its help in dealing with hate crimes.

Axworthy Honored

WINNIPEG — Lloyd Axworthy, minister of Human Resources Development and minister of Western Economic Development, will receive B'nai Brith Canada's 1995 Award of Merit at a dinner here Nov. 23.

Axworthy will be honored for his "outstanding commitment and contribution [to] the fields of education and Canadian politics," a statement from B'nai Brith says.

Peace Symposium

WINNIPEG — The local office of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University will sponsor a symposium on Middle East peace Oct. 1.

Participants will include Eli Yerushalmi, Israel's acting ambassador to Canada; Palestinian representative Bakr Abdel Munem; and representatives from Egypt and Jordan.

In Memory of Leef

TORONTO — Grade 6 students at Associated Hebrew Schools will run in this year's Terry Fox Run on Sept. 22 in memory of Phyllis Leef, a teacher at Associated who died several years ago.

This is the fourth year Associated has teamed with the Cancer Society by taking part in the annual run.

ISRAEL

Gunmen Killed

JERUSALEM — Three Hezbollah gunmen were killed last week in clashes with Israel Defence Force troops in the southern Lebanon security zone.

The gunmen were on their way to carry out an attack against IDF and South Lebanon Army soldiers, Yediot Achronot reported.

IDF Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak said recently that the stepped-up Hezbollah activity was a sign of desperation in the group's ranks.

Extremists Arrested

HEBRON — Avishai Raviv, head of the Eyal Jewish extremist group, was arrested here last Wednesday.

Eyal is a Kach splinter group that claimed responsibility for the recent murder of an Arab civilian in the town of Halhoul. Raviv, however, has denied responsibility for the murder.

Former Kach spokesperson Noam Federman was also arrested in Hebron, and was reportedly also questioned about the Halhoul murder.

However, a senior police source said Raviv's arrest is not connected with the Halhoul investigation.

Israel Radio quoted security sources as saying it is unlikely that either Eyal or another Jewish extremist group, the Sword of David, was responsible for the murder.

Appeal from Spy

JERUSALEM — An Israeli convicted of spying for the former Soviet Union has asked the Supreme Court to free him for health reasons.

Chief Justice Aharon Barak opened last week's hearing to the media for the first time, at the request of 76-year-old Marcus Klingberg.

Klingberg has served 13 years of an 18-year sentence.

His attorney asked that the remainder of his sentence be commuted due to failing health.

Israel is opposed to the early release, saying Klingberg could still reveal sensitive information.

WORLD

Bomb 'Factory' Explodes

GAZA CITY — A powerful explosion in an apartment here killed a known member of Izzadin Kassam, the armed wing of Hamas, last Wednesday.

Palestinian police found more than 10 kilograms of TNT and other explosives in the apartment, which was being used as a bomb factory.

They said the victim was probably planning an attack to coincide with the second anniversary of the Oslo accord.

An unidentified woman in the apartment with him was wounded.

Jews Protest Name

ROME — Despite protests from Jews and left-wing politicians, Rome's leftist mayor is determined to rename a street after a top official in Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini's government.

Mayor Francesco Rutelli has defended the move to name the street after former education minister Giuseppe Bottai, who signed laws ordering Jews out of Italy's schools, as a way for Italians to come to terms with their Fascist past.

The Italian Zionist Federation, the Evangelical Churches in Italy, Italian Jewish communities, and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre have denounced the idea.

But Rome's top rabbi, Elio Toaff, dismissed the controversy.

"Street names come and go with great ease, and I know Rutelli too well to think this represents a tendency towards fascism," the rabbi said.

Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest "Winners"

The response of our readers to the call for photos was very gratifying. The CJN wishes to thank everyone who entered the contest. We received many photos which were imaginative, creative, thoughtful and evocative. However, we could only select three of them as "winners".

BB accuses Masse of 'racist intimidation'

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A suggestion by Marcel Masse, president of the Conseil de la Langue Francaise, that there could be a backlash against non-francophones if they push the No forces to a narrow majority, triggered charges of racism and xenophobia from Jewish organizations last week.

B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights chair Allan Adel called on Premier Jacques Parizeau to fire Masse and termed his comments, "racist intimidation."

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) also said Parizeau should think about ousting Masse.

"That is certainly something to be considered," said CJC-Q director Jack Jedwab.

Masse, a former cabinet minister under Brian Mulroney, was reported as saying that, "If a majority of francophones, at least, vote Yes it will be a big clash six or seven months after when they will realize for the first time since 1759, the majority of francophones have no control over their land. That will be a big shock."

In January, Parizeau fired Pierre Bourgault, an advisor, for warning of potential violent recriminations if most francophones vote Yes but the No forces win anyway.

Last week in the National Assembly, Parizeau wrote off protests over Masse's comments by Liberal MNA Liza Frulla as an attempt to divert the issue by creating impressions of intolerance where none exist.

Frulla had also criticized comments by former Parti Quebecois finance minister Yves Duhaine, who reportedly accused federal cabinet minister Lucienne Robillard of not having what it takes to "save the race."

In a strongly-worded statement by B'nai Brith, Adel said Masse's remarks "cast an intolerant shadow across all francophone Quebecers ...

"Any suspicion of racism must not be allowed to intrude upon what is described by Parizeau as a democratic exercise."

Jedwab characterized Masse's remarks as a "clearly unacceptable expression of intolerance," and called on Parizeau to "proceed with disciplinary measures.

Marcel Masse

"It is unfortunate that expressions of xenophobia are emerging at this early a point in the campaign, and they have to be dealt with forthrightly."

He said the Jewish, Greek, and Italian constitutional coalition would be meeting to decide on a common strategy to deal with future similar incidences "as they may arise."

Late last week, apparently responding to the controversy, Confederation of National Trade Unions (CNTU) president Gerald Larose defended Quebec as a tolerant society, pointing to its treatment of the Jewish community as proof.

Larose told 200 CNTU delegates at a meeting, "There are fewer racist acts in Quebec than in Ontario. There is less anti-Semitism in Quebec than in Ontario ... "

Louise Beaudoin, Masse's superior and minister responsible for the French language, said Masse was simply stating a fact. "I don't feel it was aggressive or intolerant."

CJC blasts feds on Nazi case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Spokespersons for Canadian Jewish Congress have employed their strongest language yet in criticizing federal authorities for the way they are handling cases involving alleged Nazi war criminals.

This time, Congress' ire was aimed at federal authorities for failing to ensure that alleged war criminal Konrad Kalejs remained in jail pending a deportation hearing.

"This was total incompetence on the part of the government, a disgraceful performance," said Irving Abella, former Congress president and the organization's chief spokesperson on war crimes.

"It is a betrayal of the commitment made to us by the Canadian government that Nazi war criminals would not be allowed into Canada," he said.

"[Kalejs] is making a mockery of the whole process," said Jack Silverstone, Congress' legal counsel. "He shouldn't have been allowed into the country."

The Congress officials were reacting to what they termed a "bungled" performance by an Immigration Department case presenting officer (CPO) at Kalejs's immigration hearing last week.

Bernie Farber, Congress' director of community relations who attended the hearing, said the CPO did not back up with written documentation his claim that Kalejs had skipped bail in the United States and forfeited $750,000. In fact, the CPO did not present any written documentation to support his case, Farber said.

Adding to Congress' chagrin was that Kalejs left Canada in June prior to a deportation hearing. At the time, Congress had urged federal authorities to keep him in custody pending the hearing.

"It's always the same story," Silverstone said. "I don't think Immigration supports the presence of war criminals in Canada but they should recognize these are extraordinary cases, not routine cases."

The fact that a CPO was allowed to handle the case and not a more senior Justice Department lawyer suggests that Immigration does not consider these cases anything but routine, Silverstone added.

Two weeks ago, Kalejs returned to Toronto and was stopped at the airport before being released. He returned on his own for an interview with Immigration authorities and was then detained in custody for the weekend pending the hearing, Immigration spokesperson Kevin Sack said.

Kalejs, 81, is alleged to have been an officer in the Arajs Kommando that collaborated with Nazi forces in wartime Latvia.

He was deported from the United States on April 8, 1994 after 10 years of legal battles. A U.S. Circuit Court judge found that Kalejs "was a key officer in a unit that ... killed tens of thousands of innocents."

The Immigration Department plans to oppose Kalejs' presence in Canada because there is evidence he was involved in war crimes and because he is not a genuine visitor, Sack said.

No date for a deportation hearing has yet been set.

The view from Washington:

Mideast peace attainable

CJN staff reporter Frances Kraft accompanied the United Jewish Appeal's third annual Washington Fly-In at the invitation of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. The intensive day-long program included stops at the State Department and Capitol Hill as well as the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Peace in the Middle East is achievable, according to a representative of the American State Department.

Aaron Miller, deputy to the coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process, was the first speaker to brief the 130-member group flown from Toronto to Washington last week.

The nature of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has undergone an important shift, said Miller, who is Jewish and has worked for four secretaries of state. The conflict is no longer between the mainstreams of Arab and Israeli society, but between the extremes, he said.

"If the mainstreams can maintain control of these negotiations and not succumb to the pressure of [proponents of] violence and terror, there is a much higher probability of success."

The United States has played and will likely continue to play a "fundamental role" in the peace negotiations, including billions of dollars worth of assistance and shared information and technology, Miller noted.

But there are limitations. The government of Israel has made it very clear, said Miller, that it wants to be responsible for its own security. Miller backs that decision as "sound and right.

"There is no way any external party to this conflict can tell them what they need to do when it comes to making choices [affecting their] existence."

In response to a question about the U.S. government's willingness to deploy security troops along the Golan Heights, Miller said, "If negotiations [between Israel and Syria] warrant some measure of U.S. participation, then of course we would be willing."

Shoshana Bryen, former executive director of Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs (JINSA), was less upbeat.

Despite Israel's peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan and its accord with the Palestinians, Bryen is not convinced that the Arabs have accepted the Jews as "a legitimate player" in the Middle East.

It's still illegal for most Jordanians to have business with Israelis, she cited as one example.

Although many Arab countries, among them Oman, Qatar, Tunisia and Morocco, are no longer overtly hostile to Israel, the assumption that their changed attitude will earn them American foreign aid is mistaken, she said. "We don't have the money. Foreign aid is in terrible shape."

In another briefing, New Jersey Senator Frank Lautenberg (one of nine Jewish U.S. senators) said that U.S. foreign aid has decreased from over $21 billion in 1981 to $12.3 billion this year, $3 billion of which is designated for Israel, $2 billion for Egypt.

Aaron Miller

Shoshana Bryen

Bryen stressed that people have an obligation to understand their government and noted that Canada's recent lifting of its arms embargo on Israel is not cause for happiness because it also applies to Syria.

Bryen pointed a finger at Germany, France and Switzerland for their roles in arms proliferation. Although the German government has implemented end user laws prohibiting the sale of weapons to countries like Iraq, German arms manufacturers have set up operations in nearby Switzerland, thus enabling them to bypass the German laws, she said. The French also sell nuclear equipment, Bryen said.

The Palestinian issue pales in comparison to the issue of weaponry proliferation, Bryen said. "Iraq is much more threatening than the Palestinians ever were." Now that Iraqui nuclear reactors are buried underground, they can't be targeted and destroyed as Israel did prior to the Gulf War, she noted.

Fly-in participants were also briefed on the Rise of Right-Wing Militia Movements by Jess Hordes of the Anti-Defamation League and Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress (an organization funded by UJA dollars). A scheduled speaker from the Federal Bureau of Investigation was not there.

About 15,000 members of armed right-wing extremist movements are now operating in 40 U.S. states, said Hordes.

One of the higher profile groups is the white supremacist Aryan Nations who promote the belief "that Jews are children of Satan [and] that non-whites are essentially mud people who live an existence equivalent to that of animals."

The Liberty Lobby Group, "the largest most influential, wealthiest radical right-wing organization in the United States," is connected to the militia movement, Hordes said.

Hate material is purveyed via modern technology including the Internet and American cable television programs, Hordes explained.

Farber put a Canadian spin on Hordes' information, praising Canada's anti-hate laws under which it is a criminal offence to knowingly promote hatred against a definable group.

The militia movement doesn't affect Canada directly, said Farber, because militias are illegal in Canada. "We don't have the right to bear arms or to create private armies, but that doesn't mean it's not happening," he warned.

An article about other aspects of the Washington Fly-In will appear in next week's CJN.

Jewish poor facing hard times

Community expected to help its own: Harnick

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a result of Ontario government cuts in social assistance, Toronto's Jewish community must spend another $750,000 to mantain the present level of services for its poorer members, Morris Zbar, director of planning and allocations for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, said recently.

He asked Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick, guest speaker at a Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region executive meeting, what the government could do to help out.

"I can't speak for the minister of Community and Social Services but I suspect that if in the administration of these services expenses can be saved, we will enable you to do it in a more efficient way," Harnick responded.

In the rest of his reply to Zbar's question, Harnick limited himself to a defence of the "learnfare" and "workfare" aspects of the welfare system, (the government is cutting welfare payments by 25 per cent) and its incentives for people to go back to work.

Earlier, in his main address, replying to an introductory note by chair Moshe Ronen that the Jewish community is worried about cuts to social assistance, and before Zbar's question, Harnick declared:

Charles Harnick (right) addresses a meeting of the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region with Ontario chair Moshe Ronen (centre) and regional executive-director Manuel Prutschi looking on.

"This is a [Jewish] community that doesn't ask more from the government than the government can give. I know that the community will make up the difference. We don't want to discourage that."

Harnick said the government would make no cuts to senior citizens receiving social assistance or with disabilities.

The attorney general made only a brief reference to the issue of government funding for Jewish day schools. "I want to see in the next period some movement toward dealing with that issue," he said. "As attorney general, it is improper for me to discuss the case as it is before the courts."

Ed Morgan, the Congress' legal adviser on funding, said he expected the matter to be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada next March or April.

Ronen welcomed Harnick "as one of our own" and noted he is the first Jew to serve as attorney general in an Ontario cabinet.

A Danforth holiday

TORONTO — Rosh Hashanah and souvlaki. It's becoming an annual tradition on the Danforth.

Once again, the Greek community has come through for the fledgling Riverdale Community Shul. The congregation will be holding High Holy Day services in the Ellas Restaurant at 702 Pape Ave., just north of the Danforth. Last year, services were held at the Athenian Gardens.

"We're holding a traditional service in a non-traditional setting," shul founder Simcha Jacobvici told the CJN. "Last year we had such an overwhelming response there was not even standing room. People were out on the street.

"The Athenian Gardens offered again, but we needed a bigger space. So we approached Saul [Korman]. He knows everybody in the Greek community."

Tommy Dimacopoulos, owner of the Ellas, told The CJN he was happy to donate the space to the shul.

For information about services at the Riverdale shul call 466-9431 or 785-9299.

Feds, provinces study broadening anti-hate law

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A review of Canada's hate laws is underway with the federal government, which may result in specific penalties for desecration of a religious site and membership in certain groups to be considered a criminal offence, Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick said here recently.

The review will also examine whether the definition of a victimized group can be expanded to make prosecutions easier and whether hate material on the Internet should be prosecuted.

Speaking to last week's Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region executive meeting, Harnick described the review as a "worthwhile initiative" in view "of the proliferation of hate crimes and incidents."

The review will also deal with the question of eliminating certain kinds of defence to hate charges, such as the defence of truth, the attorney general said.

"Your commitment to fighting hate is known to us," said CJC Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen in thanking Harnick.

Ed Morgan, the region's legal advisor, said Harnick had shown his concern with hate crimes while a member of the opposition "and I expect he will be more active than his predecessor."

In the past, police have not made many recommendations for prosecution under hate laws, "and I hope they will look at things with fresh eyes now," Morgan said.

He said Congress has met with the German consul several times because Germany is concerned about hate literature printed in Canada and distributed in Germany in violation of that country's laws.

Congress to discuss peace process disunity

TORONTO — Declaring that the Canadian Jewish Congress "must come to grips with some degree of disunity in the community," Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen announced that the next meeting of its executive Nov. 9 will be devoted entirely to the situation in Israel.

"Constituents of our own have different viewpoints and we have to deal with the question," said Ronen.

"There is no civil war going on, but it is a very emotional and a very philosophic argument."

He identified only two organizations with differing viewpoints — Yesha and Peace Now.

"Yesha is distributing a short video clip that is quite powerful and has raised certain questions of policy and community leadership. We have to deal with the questions."

Ronen said he thought the video should be shown to the executive but said he did not know whether Peace Now has a video to put forth its position.

"I'm expecting a wide ranging debate on the peace process," Ronen said.

He made the announcement at the end of a long executive meeting dealing with hate laws, cuts in social assistance to the Jewish community and the Quebec referendum, and there was no debate from the floor.

— B.R.

"We will win the referendum" - Jedwab

TORONTO — The Jewish community in Quebec is 96 per cent in favor of the province remaining in Canada. And among the French speaking members of the community, the figure is 92 per cent, the Ontario region executive of the Canadian Jewish Congress was told recently.

"We will win the referendum," pledged Jack Jedwab, Quebec region executive director, speaking to the Ontario region executive meeting last week. The referendum vote in Quebec is to be held Oct. 30.

"It looks like we've put an end to the menace of separation," Jedwab said.

He said he was asked recently by a senior member of the Parti Quebecois government what the Jewish community will do in the event of a Yes victory. "I told him I don't answer hypothetical questions."

Asked about the reaction of the Jewish community if there is a Yes result, Jedwab said: "I don't hear a lot of talk about exodus."

A militarily strong Israel called guardian of peace

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The only possible peace there can be between Israel and its Arab neighbors is one in which Israel proves it has the capacity and the will to wage war and to win it, says an expert in military strategy.

Col. (res.) Yoash Tsiddon, a former Air Force officer and strategic planner, a former MK for the Tsomet party, and a hero of the struggle for Israeli independence, was speaking at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue at a lecture sponsored by One Israel/Canadian Friends of Yesha and Canadian Friends of Ramat HaGolan.

Avigdor Kahalani, who was supposed to be the keynote speaker, was unable to attend for personal reasons.

This kind of peace, Tsiddon said, is similar to the Cold War between the United States and the former Soviet Union, where the enormous economic and political differences could allow only "a state of no war" kind of relationship.

This is one of the major reasons, he said, that Israel must maintain control of the Golan Heights.

Like the other Arab countries surrounding Israel, Syria is a totalitarian state, where political continuity is not guaranteed.

"Assad is the 13th leader of Syria. The first 11 were decapitated, the 12th is in jail. Assad is now 65 — pretty soon either God or man will determine what will happen to him."

Whatever agreements are reached with such leaders, Tsiddon suggested, are shaky.

Israel's ability "to wage war and win it" is dependent on three factors: firepower, mobility and terrain, he said.

"We have always been inferior in firepower, and we have good mobility provided the roads are not under observation."

We must, he said, retain the line of volcanic hills that control the Golan and thus control Israel.

Syria has many ballistic missiles, which, if fired into Israel will hit large military installations and urban areas, causing widespread disruption.

"The regular forces are expected to hold the line for 48 to 72 hours, until the reserves can be mobilized. But if the missiles attack, everything and everybody will be shifting around, and mobilization may take 120 to 150 hours.

"And the Air Force won't be there, because it will have been sent to hit those missiles, especially the defensive ones."

The presence of those missiles, then, "increases the need to put forces behind strong lines, with the best possible lines of sight."

For that reason, Tsiddon declared, "Israel must stay put."

He warned that there are already calls to revoke the Law of Return, to allow the return of Arab refugees and to change the anthem and the flag.

"I want to prevent what the Arabs want — the dismemberment of the Jewish state."

Haim Saperia, a member of the Golan Residents' Committee, urged financial help to continue their efforts to publicize their cause.

New Year's Greetings to the Jewish Community from the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

York's programs in Jewish Studies offer students a Bachelor of Arts degree or a combined Bachelor of Arts/Bachelor of Education degree.

Areas of focus within York's Centre for Jewish Studies include: Classical Judaism • Teacher Education • the Jewish Community in Canada • Sephardic Culture • Canada-Israel Relations • Holocaust Studies • Jewish Thought • Jewish Women's Studies • Jews in Film, Sports, Recreation and Leisure.

Art Eggleton, MP and President of the Federal Treasury Board, presents a cheque from Heritage Canada to Professor Joe Levy in support of his research project. Centre Director Michael Brown is looking on.

Exchanges and Cooperative Activities

• An agreement with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for an exchange of students and faculty. Twenty-three York students will be studying at the Hebrew University in 1995-96.

• The Canada-Israel Academic Exchange brings to York and the community visiting Israeli scholars each year. In 1995-96 Professor Aryeh Ratner of Haifa University will be teaching in York's Department of Sociology.

• Joint projects with the International Center for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization under the auspices of the President of Israel and the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

• A research program in Canadian Jewish Studies with Concordia University in Montreal, funded through an endowment grant from the Ministry of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. Projects for 1995-96 include: A Study of the Leisure Activities of Jewish Seniors; A Bibliography of Canadian Jewish Studies; and A Study of the Constitutions of Canadian-Jewish Organizations. The two universities are planning a national conference on Jewish Studies in Canada for the spring of 1996.

Special Events

• The Leonard Wolinsky Lecture Series, which serves both the University and the community, focuses on significant themes in Jewish life. The 1995 lectures on recent trends in Jewish education were presented by Professor Walter Ackerman of Ben Gurion University. The 1996 lectures, "Text and Context: The Tension Through the Ages", will be given by Professor James Kugel of Harvard and Bar Ilan universities.

• Creating the Jewish Future - a conference to be held at York in the fall of 1996 focusing on Jewish Continuity. Visiting scholars will include Mr. Hillel Halkin and Professsors Paula Hyman, Aviezer Ravitzky, Steven Cohen and Daniel Elazar. Also participating in the conference will be community professionals and volunteer leaders. It is sponsored by Mr. Bernie Ghert.

• Sephardic Studies Lecture Series - Four lectures open to the community to be held in the fall of 1995.

Intimidation will fail

The contest for the country has been formally declared. And as the federalist forces appear to be gaining strength, some of the separatists' masks are starting to fall away, leaving us to see what we had hoped did not exist: a repugnant face of xenophobia and ethnic discrimination.

How else can we explain the remarks made last week by Marcel Masse, president of the Conseil de la Langue Française? As reported in The CJN, Mr. Masse suggested that there could be a backlash against non-francophones if their votes are instrumental in swinging the outcome of the referendum away from the separatists' cause. He even hinted at possible clashes, presumably between francophone and non-francophone Quebecers, if a majority Francophone separatist vote is thwarted by the rest of the province, "when they will realize for the first time since 1759, the majority of francophones have no control over their land."

Jewish leaders responded quickly and forcefully, condemning Mr. Masse and his questionable remarks. The remarks deserved to be condemned, for they were offensive and objectionable, hinting at the acceptability of a benign sort of ethnic-cleansing-by-referendum.

It is not enough that separatists are determined to drive Quebec out Canada. It seems that they are also determined to drive certain No-voting Quebecers out of Quebec. But the strategy will not work.

The intimidation will fail. It will serve only to strengthen the resolve of the non-francophone voter, also born in Quebec and bred in its unique rhythms and customs, also yearning for personal fulfillment and cultural security, also loving the province and no less part of its rich, centuries-old fabric than the company kept by Mr. Masse.

Poisoned airwaves

But Quebec City was not the only place last week where private bigotry was given public expression. In Toronto, a radio news broadcaster gave vent to shocking and crude anti-Semitism. The newscaster was Brian Henderson. The radio station was CHUM-AM, a station whose programming is aimed at baby boomers and their children.

Henderson was commenting on the funding problems faced by Ontario's Legal Aid system. He diagnosed the "root cause of the crisis" to be "Jewish mothers," explaining it this way. "Jewish mothers are infamous for advising their offspring to become doctors or dentists or lawyers, or to marry a doctor or dentist or lawyer, and the result is we have too many of all three in this province, most especially lawyers."

In this case as well, community leaders responded quickly and forcefully. The Canadian Jewish Congress (Ontario region) demanded both an on-air apology and the broadcaster's dismissal. The president of the station did offer an apology, but it was weak and ineffectual.

Even as low-level street humor, the remarks were in very bad taste. But amazingly, Henderson apparently was not speaking tongue-in-cheek. He was purporting to offer a serious commentary on the news.

The offence in Henderson's remarks lies not only in the nature of their poison; it lies equally in the nature of his position. He was broadcasting to an audience of thousands, many of whom, sadly, may have swallowed the drivel whole.

Henderson's irresponsible, ignorant behavior is utterly unacceptable. Until CHUM-AM fully acknowledges it as such, there should be no letup in the pressure brought to bear against it.

Agrees with Yad Vashem decision

I am writing this letter in response to the article in The CJN (Montreal edition, August 31), entitled "Yad Vashem Rejects Survivor's Request to Honor SS Officer." I strongly agree with the decision rendered by Yad Vashem denying Willi Michael the status of Righteous Gentile.

I was in Bunzlau from mid-November 1943, on the death march to Dora B12 and from there to Belsen, which was liberated on April 15, 1945.

SS Hauptsturmfurer Willi Michael (Rittmeister in World War I) was a university graduate. He was a high ranking, management staff command officer of many concentration camps during World War II. Despite his advanced age, he volunteered for the German army and was on the Russian front. During that period, he asked to be transferred to the SS Totenkopf Vachverbonde der Konzentrations Lager. He was not a simple guard. In the east, he had managed mass deportations of civilians and war prisoners to German to keep the concentration camps at full capacity, while more waited in locked box cars to be let out.

Later on in early spring 1944, as the defeated Germany shrank, he transferred back into Germany near his home in Gorlitz Lower Silesia, to manage concentration camps himself. From the very first day he arrived in Bunzlau Lower Silesia, it was evident that, SS Hauptsturmfurer Willi Michael was a professional and experienced slave prisoner handler.

He had many concentration camps under his supervision in Lower Silesia and Bunzlau was just one of them. SS Hauptsturmfurer Willi Michael gave the order in the dying minutes of the war and sent us on a death march across Germany.

All claims supporting the desire to honor Willi Michael as a righteous gentile make no mention of concentration camps Dora and B12 or his responsibility in shipping us to Bergen-Belsen. Nor is there any mention that SS Hauptsturmfurer Willi Michael's last assignment was taking over the management of the concentration extermination camp Neuengamme, in the last month of the war. He was promoted in SS rank in April 1945 a few days before the war ended in this area.

Alternative funeral services

I want to thank you and Leila Speisman for the recent informative article about funeral alternatives, "New funeral chapels give families a choice" (August 3).

It is not accurate to call Hebrew Basic Burial a "new funeral chapel," since theirs is a storefront operation with no chapel, which provides only graveside services. The Simple Alternative does have a chapel in its facility and offers chapel or synagogue services at no extra cost.

Speisman refers to "unadorned, albeit halachically correct funerals," as if to say: "They're inexpensive, and oh, by the way, halachically correct." My understanding of Jewish funeral traditions is that halachically correct includes the funeral and casket being simple and unadorned. Our priority at The Simple Alternative is to be halachically observant first, with our low costs being a by-product of following tradition.

The Barrie connection was valuable

I would like to publicly say mazal tov to Susan Jackson on her recent appointment as Continuity programmer as announced in the Sept. 7 issue.

As director of community services and youth activities for the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, she was indeed one of Canada's most experienced outreach specialists as she is described in the article.

In 1993, my husband and I moved to Barrie, Ont. From my previous work at Congress, I knew that there existed a list of small Jewish communities and I asked Susan to give me the name of the person in Barrie. I phoned and asked to be put on the mailing list. Subsequently, because of that list, I was able to find a Jewish doctor, Gerald Levine, who was also president of the Simcoe County Jewish Association.

Chutzpah musical is right on!

I wish to respond to the review of the musical Chutzpah a go-go (CJN, August 31). Unlike your staff reporter who did not give the play the high rating it deserves, I thoroughly enjoyed the musical.

Co-producers and actors David Gale and Randy Vancourt and the rest of the cast were superb.

It appeared that some of the people who attended the performance the night I was there could not appreciate good natured humor and they should lighten up a little. I could not stop laughing.

As a teacher and freelance reporter, I highly recommend that my fellow lovers of Yiddishkeit both young and young at heart see this wonderful production.

Defends Israeli soldier's action

I would like to comment on the adventure of a Toronto dentist. I write in defence of the Israeli soldier.

I know the Israeli soldier. He is courageous, ready for sacrifice, hard working and trying hard to do his duty. He stands at a checkpoint where he was ordered to stay. Along comes an arrogant person. He confronts the soldier, but the soldier is a tough defender — he strikes him (not strongly enough in my opinion).

The biggest mistake the dentist made was to go to the press at home and present the situation as if he was in serious danger.

Sephardi traditions rich in symbols

By AVIV OUANOUNOU

Rosh Hashanah is one of the most widely celebrated Jewish holidays. We commonly associate this holiday with family gatherings, apples and honey and prayers for a sweet and healthy year. For Jews of Sephardi heritage, Rosh Hashanah is a holiday steeped in tradition and rich in symbolism.

The customs and rituals of Sephardi Jews, which can be traced back to Spain in the Middle Ages, have been preserved throughout the centuries in the many lands where they have lived since the expulsion from Spain in 1492. One of the most outstanding characteristics of Sephardi Jews is their stubborn adherence to the customs and practices of their ancestors. As we prepare to celebrate Rosh Hashanah 5756, I would like to describe some of the beautiful Sephardi prayers and customs that mark the beginning of the new year.

Preparation for the Day of Judgement, as it is referred to in our liturgy, begins on the first day of Elul, when Selichot are recited. Our community elders clearly recall how the gabbai of the synagogue would wake the men for Selichot in the early hours of the morning, every day of the month of Elul.

It is interesting to note the structure of the selichot themselves. Most of the prayers are arranged in alphabetical order. This method of organization may be seen as our attempt to impose a semblance of order on a world disturbed and "confused" by our sins.

Also in Elul, we begin to blow the shofar each morning. The words of the selichot and the stirring sound of the shofar call on each individual to return to G-d during this auspicious period, when He is especially close to His nation and willing to forgive their sins.

Another widespread tradition among Sephardi Jews was to visit the tombs of the tzadikim and chachamim on the eve of Rosh Hashanah. Sephardi Jews have always had great emunah (faith) in these holy men who, we believe, are able to achieve a special closeness to G-d and to communicate with Him through prayers and dreams.

A recent study by Prof. Isachar Ben-Ami of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem has revealed approximately 1,000 tombs of tzadikim in Morocco. According to Ben-Ami's research, most of these tombs were located in the Atlas Mountains, in "places that the human foot did not step." These righteous individuals strove to live a life of spirituality and tzniut (modesty).

For this reason, they would live in small, unpopulated areas where they could concentrate on their study of Torah and Kabbalah. Because these rabbis were so isolated from "worldly ideals," they reached levels of spirituality which were so high that they could easily communicate with G-d.

Therefore, before Rosh Hashanah, we approach these tzadikim and beseech them to intercede on our behalf before G-d and ask Him to grant us a happy new year.

The Sephardi High Holy Day services include many beautiful poems or piyutim, traditionally referred to as bakashot. Shirat Habakashot (the name for this traditional Sephardi poetry) originated in Tzefat and was heavily influenced by the Lurian Kabbalah. The poetry was compiled in a book called Shir Yedidut (poem of friendship) at the beginning of the 20th century.

Traditionally on the High Holy Days, these piyutim are recited by the congregation, led by a chazzan and two somchim (assistants). The custom of having three chazzanim in all Sephardi synagogues is derived from the biblical episode describing the battle of the Israelites with Amalek shortly after the Exodus from Egypt, as it is written (17:11-12): "When Moses held up his hands, then Israel prevailed ... But Moses' hands were heavy ... and Aaron and Hur supported his hands, from this side one and from this side one, and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun." In the same way, three chazzanim petition the Almighty on behalf of the entire congregation.

Two famous piyutim recited on the evenings of Rosh Hashanah are Achot Ketanah (Little Sister) by the poet Avraham Hazzan and Hon Tachon (Please have mercy).

The first is recited at the opening of the evening service on the first night of Rosh Hashanah. In this very moving piyut, the poet refers to the Jewish people as a little sister and describes how the Jews have deteriorated spiritually as a result of the long and bitter exile. Each verse of this song ends with the words "Tichleh shanah ve'killelotechah" (Let the curses of the year come to an end). At the conclusion of the piyut, the entire congregation joins the chazzanim, singing the words Tachel shanah u'birchotehah (Let a year of blessings begin).

"FOR YOU MY SOUL YEARNS FROM THE FAR REACHES OF THE WEST"

Many of the piyutim which have found their way into Jewish liturgy were inspired by the great medieval Spanish poets and writers. This wallhanging by Haim Maor features a line of poetry by Yehuda Halevi, one of those poets.

The second piyut, Hon Tachon, marks the beginning of the services of the second night of Rosh Hashanah. In this prayer, the poet asks G-d to have mercy on His people in the merit of our forefathers. When leaving the synagogue, each person greets his neighbor with the words Shanah Tovah (A happy New Year) and Tikatev l'chaim tovim u'l'shalom (May you be inscribed for a good life, a life of peace).

On Rosh Hashanah, Sephardi Jews eat a group of special foods symbolic of our hopes for the new year. We have a unique seder (order) of blessings, each beginning with the words Yehi ratzon (May it be Thy will), which are recited over a variety of fruits and vegetables, including apples, Swiss chard, dates, gourds, leeks, sesame and pomegranates. The Talmud mentions the custom of eating vegetables and fruits whose Hebrew names can conjure up positive associations. For instance, it is our custom to eat dates, called tmarim in Hebrew, because we can connect this word to the blessing of: Yehi ratzon, she'yitamu oyvecha v'sonecha v'chol me'vakshe ra'atenu" "May it be Thy will that our enemies be vanquished (literally, be brought to their end).

Some Sephardi Jews observe the custom of eating the head of a lamb or the head of a fish to symbolize success and fertility. In some Moroccan communities, it was the custom to eat re'ya (lungs) and to recite the following verse: "Re'ei na be'onyenu, ve'riva riveinu, u'maher le'ga'lenu ge'ulah sheleima" (Behold us in our affliction, and take up our fight and speedily redeem us).

As is the custom in Ashkenazi communities, Sephardim eat a special new fruit, preferably from the shivat haminim (the seven special fruits of the Land of Israel), on the second night of Rosh Hashanah, in order to recite the blessing of Shehechianu. The traditional main course eaten by Sephardim on Rosh Hashanah is couscous, accompanied by sweet fruits and vegetables. The food must be light in color and many people refrain from eating spicy foods, choosing instead to eat sweet foods, so that they will be blessed with a shanah tovah u'metukah (sweet new year).

During the morning service of Rosh Hashanah, more piyutim are chanted, composed mainly by Rav Yehudah HaLevy (1075-1141) and Rav Shlomo Ibn Gvirol (1022-1058). One of the best known piyutim is that of Rav Yehudah HaLevy, Hashem, yom l'cha e'eroch t'china.

This special bakashah consists of 26 lines and is arranged according to the following pattern: the first stanza is composed of 10 lines, each beginning with the letter yod, the second stanza has five lines beginning with the letter heh, the third stanza has six lines beginning with the letter vav and the final stanza has five lines beginning with the letter heh, thus symbolically spelling out God's name.

Another poignant song recited during the morning service is Et Sha'arei Ratzon (The time when the heavenly gates are open), recited in some congregations when the ark is opened and in others before the blowing of the shofar. This piyut describes the Akedah (the binding of Isaac), which is the Torah portion read on the second day of Rosh Hashanah. The poet imagines the supplications of the angels as they plead with G-d to save Isaac from the sacrifice: "How can the world lose such a beautiful light as Isaac?" they cry out in anguish. The poet describes how Abraham prepares the altar to sacrifice his son, presenting Abraham with tears in his eyes and a heart full of happiness, expressing his unwavering faith in G-d. The piyut concludes with G-d's promise to Abraham that He will forgive the Jewish people now and in future generations.

The Musaf Amidah for Rosh Hashanah is the longest in the prayer book and consists of three central portions that illustrate the main characteristics of the holiday. These are Malchuyot, which stresses G-d's kingship over all creatures of the Universe, Zichronot, literally meaning remembrances, referring to G-d's remembrance of the acts of faith performed by our ancestors, and Shofarot verses concerning the shofar.

The Malchuyot prayer begins with the words lo hibit aven b'Yacov (there is no sin in Jacob) and its central section refers to the sovereignty of G-d.

Zichronot concerns itself with the way of Divine Justice, recording that G-d remembers everything in the universe. It opens with the words Ata zocher ma'ase olam o'foked kol yetzore kedem (You recall all deeds of the world).

Shofarot, the last of the three sections, begins with the words Ata nigleta be'annan kevoudecha (You revealed yourself in the cloud of Your glory). It deals with G-d's manifestation at Mount Sinai and the days of universal redemption.

The Musaf Amidah is very similar, if not identical, to the service recited in Ashkenazi congregations.

After the morning service and afternoon meal, sleeping is prohibited, as it is considered improper to sleep on the Day of Judgment. Therefore, it is the custom among many Sephardi Jews to read the entire book of Tehilim twice, 300 chapters in total. The number 300 equals the numerical value of the Hebrew word ka-per (atone).

Also in the afternoon, it is the custom of Sephardim (like the Ashkenazim) to perform the Tashlich ceremony, as derived from the words of the prophet Micha: "And thou shalt cast all your sins into the depths of the sea." We descend to the banks of a river and as a community, we recite special prayers that include excerpts from the Zohar (the classical text of Jewish mysticism). This symbolic ceremony represents a further attempt to cast away our sins. Many people literally empty their pockets as if to throw their sins into the river.

Since the destruction of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem, our prayers have taken the place of sacrifices and have allowed us to come closer to G-d. There is a famous rabbinic saying that there is no measure to the study of t'fillah (prayer). Our righteous ancestors spent many years creating the prayers and poems that we recite in our synagogues today. The study of these prayers is a holy task in itself; there is much we can appreciate, but there is also much that remains hidden.

The rituals of Rosh Hashanah are powerful vehicles of communication with G-d that have stood by us for countless generations and are worthy of our contemplation. We ask the Almighty to answer our prayers and to bless all the Jewish people with a healthy and prosperous New Year, Tikatevu l'shanim rabot, ne'imot, v'tovot.

Aviv Ouanounou is the chazzan of Magen David Sephardi Congregation and a PhD student at the University of Toronto, Department of Neurophysiology.

Opinions

Kol isha: the voice of women

Cynthia Ozick has observed that the Talmud scholar Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, when he spoke of the Talmud as the work of generations of Jews, had tacitly written Jewish women out of the tradition of Talmudic commentary or, even worse, had excluded them from membership in the Jewish people.

Joan M. Gerber

In The Essential Talmud (New York, Basic Books, 1976, pp. 272-273) Rabbi Steinsaltz wrote: "[The Talmud] is the collective endeavor of the entire Jewish people. Just as it has no protagonist, no central figure who sums up all discussions and subjects, so it has continued throughout the centuries to be part of a constant creative process."

Only recently, both in the study and exposition of law and in the area of the spiritual realm of prayer, has the entire Jewish people had the opportunity to become part of this constant creativity.

I do not raise this to begin discussion of women's right to participate in every aspect of Jewish life, lore and law; to me this is a given. I quote it to show that even a scholar of such depth and perception as Rabbi Steinsaltz can still make the assumption that half of the Jewish people, the male half, equals the whole.

Jewish women have every right to study Torah, become rabbis (i.e. become qualified to decide matters of Halachah), expound Torah, lead the prayers and in all things to find their own level of spiritual fulfilment without having limits to that quest prescribed by men, however erudite.

The voice of women will be heard, as the voice of Hannah was heard and her prayer is recalled to us in the Haftorah on the first day of Rosh Hashanah. Hannah at first was mis-heard when she made her request and stood up to the sleepy priest who regarded her as a drunken woman; she herself did not realize the giant step she was taking.

Nor was she alone; her husband should receive due regard. "Aren't you more to me than 10 sons?" he asked, thereby becoming the first man in the Torah to express regard for his wife as a person in her own right.

I would like to describe what this year's High Holy Day service will mean to me. In our congregation women will be reading from the Torah, my daughter among them; they will chant several of the Haftorahs (myself among them); they will be called to the bimah for aliyot; they will serve as ushers, as part of the choir, and be enthusiastic participants in the congregational response.

My generation of women had to make a case for women's participation. We had to understand Jewish law to demonstrate a knowledge of the meaning as well as the sound of prayer. We engaged in the traditional discourse of argument and counter-argument. We, like Hannah, had many allies among spouses and male friends. But it was a struggle, nevertheless.

On the other hand, my daughter assumes that she will read Torah and have an aliyah — "even though no one wanted me to do it at my bat mitzvah," she tells me. "I want to be treated as a person — I just assume that women can do these things." And there will be many of her sisters participating fully in the celebration of the New Year, the solemnity of Yom Kippur and the joy of Sukkot.

Yom Kippur to me is the most awe-filled day, in the sense we use the word awe to denote religious experience, in the Jewish calendar. The recital of Kol Nidre begins the day on such a high note that one thinks it cannot go any higher — until the morning congregational recitations, the solemn Torah reading and the Haftorahs designed to reprove the wayward and welcome repentance.

The sense of awe climaxes for me with the recitation of the Avodah service of the High Priest — redolent of the Temple itself — its sacred moment when the High Priest asked forgiveness for the entire people of Israel. We could do with that kind of national introspection and cleansing again, and how fortunate we are to be able to recall even the shadow of that time when Israel examined its collective soul.

So even though the days of awe have only recently opened their gates to women's full participation, that sacred moment is now accessible to all. It was good, but not enough, for us to be the audience.

It is not only the awe of Yom Kippur that draws women closer: the mundane is also filled with wonder. The daily minyan of 10 Jews gathered for the purpose of public prayer has been for centuries its own brotherhood. Now that women are counted, that community has become a true microcosm of the Jewish universe. What a thrill to make the 10th, as I did recently.

So when my daughters seek their own place in the community of Israel, I know they will have open to them the challenge of the law and the awe-filled moments of full participation in the community of prayer.

Rosh Hashanah and the scientist

Just as I was wondering about my Rosh Hashanah column, my eye fell on an article in the daily newspaper. It was entitled "There's no need to choose between creation and evolution." The writer sets forth the current controversy in the Christian world over the accuracy of the biblical account, which tells us that God created the world in six days — contrasting this with Charles Darwin's theory of evolution. Scientists today do not speak of six days but of millions of years, during which the earth evolved, and they theorize endlessly about the "Big Bang" which brought the universe into being.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

It is no secret that, especially south of the border, the biblical and the scientific views are locked in a bitter struggle. Thus, school boards defend the need to teach evolution, while Christian fundamentalists want them to introduce a course on "scientific creationism."

Fortunately, we Jews have rarely been caught up in controversies of this kind. One of the reasons has been that we have never claimed that human beings were able to penetrate the ultimate meaning of the Divine word. At almost every turn of our history, there have been divergent opinions over what the text means to convey. For instance, there is even a talmudic controversy over the location of Rosh Hashanah in the Jewish calendar. Rabbi Eliezar taught that the world was created in Tishrei (the seventh month which occurs in the fall), while Rabbi Joshua held that it was created in Nissan (that is, in the spring). Tradition held with Rabbi Eliezar, but the very controversy shows our willingness to contemplate different interpretations of the sacred text.

Not all Jews support Darwinian teaching. Those who believe that it contravenes the Torah will send their children to schools where evolution is not taught. That holds true for Israel as it does for the Diaspora.

Of course, moderns are sold on science and believe that it can provide the solution for most of our problems. But to assert this is nothing less than to believe in a different religion. Called "scientism," it teaches that science has all the answers. In fact, some of the greatest scientists have been well aware that this is not the case, even as the greatest teachers of our religion have always been aware that what they taught was an attempt to understand the will of God and that their interpretation did not necessarily represent incontrovertible truth.

Our knowledge of science is vastly greater than that of the ancients, which does not, however, make our world view any more advanced. Contemporary readers of Torah should restrain their inclination to do battle with ancient notions of creation. Rather, they should read the Bible for what it suggests about the nature of human history, the meaning of Jewish existence and the presence of God.

All of this suggests that we should approach the problem as we should approach the new year, with a sense of humility. We may be the "crown of creation," but we are also destined to return to the dust. The majority of this column's readers will wend their way to the synagogue on Rosh Hashanah. The old songs and prayers will teach them nothing about science and the practical problems of our everyday existence. Rather, they will be challenged to stand in awe before the Creator and, when the shofar is blown, ask themselves "Who am I and what am I doing with my life?"

Print encyclopedias face obsolescence

Stanislaw Lem, author of Fiasco and dozens of other brilliant science fiction novels (Time magazine called Lem the world's greatest writer of science fiction) describes in one of his works an encyclopedia that resembled an electronic slate and was continually updating entries on every subject imaginable. Every development in the world of politics, literature, religion and the arts and sciences was instantly downloaded into the hand-held monitor described by Lem.

By Arnold Ages

I was thinking of this technology as I was doing some reading recently in a number of encyclopedias and was chagrined to discover that except for entries on a limited number of subjects, most encyclopedias, however current, have only an antiquated or historical interest.

When Denis Diderot and his colleagues fashioned the world's first encyclopedia in Paris in 1751, they were presumptuous enough to think that they had successfully ordered all human knowledge into neat categories.

Alas the shelf life of an encyclopedia is about 25 years. Diderot didn't finish publishing his encyclopedia until 1772 and while it was celebrated as a compendium and incarnation of all progressive ideas in France, it took only 17 years and the unpleasantness known as the French Revolution to render obsolete many of the entries.

Revolutions also produce encyclopedias. The Great Soviet Encyclopedia didn't employ Lem's electronic slate to change its entries; its editors resorted to more practical if somewhat crude gestures. When Lavrenti Beria, Stalin's secret police henchman and executioner was himself liquidated in the 1950s, he became, in Soviet parlance, an "unperson."

But in the Great Soviet Encyclopedia the entry on Beria was highly laudatory. The editorial staff resorted to an original stratagem: they sent all subscribers an article on the Bering Straits and asked that it be pasted over the Beria one!

Problems which affect encyclopedias in general also impinge upon those devoted to Jewish life. There have been three major English language Jewish encyclopedias published since 1916: the Jewish Encyclopedia, the 1940 Universal Jewish Encyclopedia and the 1971 Encyclopedia Judaica, the last under Israeli auspices.

The first two are unique because they represent the contribution of Jewish scholars all over the world who before the Holocaust labored in Austria, Germany and Eastern Europe, in the vineyards of Judaic learning, and whose academic contributions to Bible, Talmud and Jewish history were monumental.

The Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, which appeared just before the systematic destruction of European Jewry, records the early stages of the persecution that led to the Holocaust.

The Encyclopedia Judaica is, as one of my colleagues pointed out to me when it was published, a multi-volume eulogy for the "disappeared" Jewish communities and their synagogues. Each entry on the great Jewish centres and on the shtetlach of Eastern Europe contains photos of beautiful synagogues that exist today only in memory or on film. This testimony to a great civilization makes the Judaica a timeless possession for the Jewish people.

However, in other areas, the Judaica is also outdated. A random look at several articles in Volume 5 indicates how quickly entries prepared in the 1960s and published in 1971 become dated. (I am aware that the Judaica publishes annual supplements but few libraries carry them.)

In its entry on Noam Chomsky, the Judaica describes the contributions of this MIT theoretical linguist to transformational grammar and other esoteric aspects of linguistic theory and indicates that Chomsky was an outspoken critic of American foreign policy in Vietnam and "refused to pay part of his taxes in protest against military spending." The article says nothing — because of later events — of Chomsky's authoring of an introduction to a book of Holocaust denial by French "revisionist" Robert Faurisson; nor does it mention Chomsky's bitter crusade against the State of Israel.

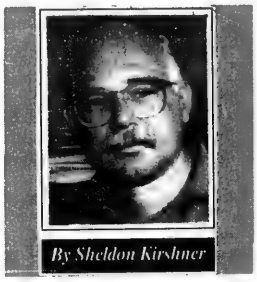
Finally, the Judaica's Dead Sea Scrolls entry, while adequate for a 1960s analysis, could not, in the light of research published since then by Lawrence Schiffman, Norman Golb, Herschel Shanks, Robert Eisenman, Michael Wise and Neil Silberman, survey the controversial usurpation of the scrolls initially by Christian scholars; nor could it discuss in detail the entire scope or nature of this legacy from the Qumram community.

The lesson is clear: until encyclopedias develop the capability of Lem's electronic slate, instant obsolescence will be their constant companion.

The Kirshner File

The remarkable odyssey of a Sephardi Jew

Victor Perera's odyssey of self-discovery has not only yielded a rich motherlode of family lore and Sephardi history. It has also touched a responsive chord among readers.



By Sheldon Kirshner

His newly-published book, The Cross and the Pear Tree (Random House, $35), has generated respectable reviews and gone into its third printing. Portuguese, Dutch and German editions are in the works, and there are plans to publish the memoir cum-genealogy in Hebrew and possibly in Spanish.

To his delight, a documentary filmmaker has expressed interest in The Cross and the Pear Tree, a vibrant chronicle which unfolds in Spain, Portugal, Holland, France, Israel, Turkey, Greece, Egypt and Guatemala.

A 61-year-old writer who teaches journalism at the University of California in Berkeley, Perera was recently in Toronto to promote his book. Casually clad in blue jeans and a loose-fitting shirt, the amiable writer explained its genesis.

He had originally intended to produce a sort of Sephardi Portnoy's Complaint. But the more deeply he probed his family tree, the more he knew he was on to something bigger.

His research led him to the realization that there was an inextricable bond between the Perera clan — which he traced back to 14th century Toledo in Spain — and the wanderings of Sephardi Jews after the Inquisition.

As a result of this catastrophe, the Pereras were torn asunder. Those who chose expulsion generally retained their Jewish faith, while those who remained behind embraced Roman Catholicism, becoming New Christians (conversos), or lived in fear as secret Jews (Marranos).

Some of these Marranos found themselves in the New World, in what is today Mexico and Guatemala. These "distant relatives," as he describes them, fared well (though one was burned at the stake in an auto-da-fe in Mexico City). Their descendants have been ambassadors, lawyers and Jesuit priests, and one was briefly a Guatemalan president.

The Pereras who fled Spain were also a fascinating lot. They were among the progenitors of Amsterdam's Sephardi community, and one of them, the zealous Abraham Israel, appears to have played a leading role in the excommunication in the 1660s of the philosopher Baruch Spinoza. Yet another ancestor, a Marrano beauty named Maria Nunes, was abducted to Elizabethan England. She rejected the marriage proposal of a British duke and Queen Elizabth's entreaties on his behalf.

The French branch of the family, known as the Pereires, prospered. As 19th century financiers, they competed with the legendary Rothschilds, buying railroad concessions and steamship lines and consorting with the cream of France's nobility. But assimilation took its toll. Today, half of the Pereires are Catholic.

The core of The Cross and the Pear, however, turns on Perera's immediate family.

His great-grandfather, Rabbi Yitzhak Moshe of Jerusalem, exhorted his sons and grandchildren never to leave the Holy Land for longer than six months, and only then on a religious mission. But under the threat of a curse, his dictate was flouted. Aharon Haim, Perera's grandfather, travelled to Central Asia and Egypt, while his father and two brothers opened a department store in Guatemala City, where Victor Perera was born.

Perera, who has written about his childhood in Rites: A Guatemalan Boyhood, begins The Cross and the Pear Tree with a pungent portrait of his feisty, Ladino-speaking mother, Tamar Nissim. Later, he introduces us to his aunt, Simha, who recalls that the Arabs in Palestine were a "shadowy and for the most part benign presence," and to his great-uncle Nissim Ohanna, the chief rabbi of Haifa. In due course, Perera searches for his great-great-grandfather's grave in Hebron and then for his grandfather's headstone in Alexandria, Egypt.

In what is doubtless the most controversial segment of the book, Perera analyzes the status of Sephardi Jews in Israel. Not too long ago, they considered themselves second-class citizens. But in recent years, they have improved their lives as the Ashkenazi elite has adopted a "more conciliatory attitude" toward them and as the schism between ultra-Orthodox and secular Jews has widened.

Perera regards himself as a "bottom-line Zionist" rather than a "political Zionist." As he put it: "If Israel's existence was in danger, I'd rush to its defence. At the same time, Israel's existence can only be guaranteed by coexistence with the Arabs."

Yaakov Ben Dov was a pioneer

In a land of pioneers and visionaries, Yaakov Ben Dov was truly one of a kind. The first Jewish filmmaker in prestate Israel to run a regularly functioning studio, he was there to record the passing parade, filming events small and large.

A Ukrainian Jew who settled in Palestine in the early years of this century, Ben Dov plied his craft from 1917 until his untimely death in 1933. Chaim Weizmann, the president of the World Zionist Organization, described his movies as "beautiful and useful."

The indefatigable Ben Dov left behind a trove of still and moving pictures which caught the ebb and flow of daily life in the Yishuv from the advent of the Balfour Declaration to the rise of Adolf Hitler.

Until recently, Ben Dov was an all but forgotten figure. But thanks to the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archives in Jerusalem, Ben Dov's valued body of work has been rediscovered, preserved and abbreviated into a 31-minute documentary, Yaakov Ben Dov: Father of the Hebrew Film.

Screened at the third annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival in May, Yaakov Gross' documentary is a celebration of Ben Dov's singular contribution.

Ben Dov's first film, Judea Liberated, documents Gen. Edmund Allenby's triumphal march into Jerusalem and the development of agriculture in the Jewish sector. His second, Land of Israel Liberated, profiles the veterans of the Jewish Legion — which fought alongside the British during World War I — and paints a cinematic portrait of Haifa.

Ben Dov's subsequent films, from The Return to Zion to The New Jewish Palestine, combine the immediacy of newsreels with the charm of travelogues:

Herbert Samuel, the first British high commissioner in Palestine, arrives by train in Jerusalem. Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, the founder of modern Hebrew, mingles at a party. A camel race unfolds in Beersheva. Winston Churchill, the British colonial secretary, mixes with Zionist personalities.

A high society wedding takes place. An ancient ruin is excavated. The Hebrew University's Mount Scopus campus is inaugurated in the presence of Lord Arthur Balfour. In Tel Aviv, Balfour is welcomed by students of Herzliya Academy, the first to use Hebrew as a language of instruction. The remains of Zionist luminary Max Nordau are interred. Jewish farmers plow their fields. The Levant Fair in Tel Aviv opens. The Maccabiah Games are kicked off. The 50th anniversary of the founding of Rishon Lezion is observed.

Ben Dov's most ambitious effort, a six-reeler with a musical score entitled Springtime in Palestine, was seen in 56 countries. A Tale of an American Tourist in Palestine was a feature commissioned by the Jewish National Fund.

Ben Dov died as he was filming his first talkie, My People's Dream. Too bad he didn't live to see it.

Israel's landscape inspires artist

The beauty of Israel's countryside, which has moved poets and novelists, has now inspired an Israeli artist.

In the awkwardly-titled Israel Landscape Watercolors (Gefen Books, $32 US), 38 of Yair David's gentle works are reproduced.

A former navigator in the Israeli Air Force, David is a sensitive draftsman who has been strongly influenced by the 19th century English school of art.

His watercolors are light and airy, emphasizing color and giving a sense of harmony and serenity.

David's renditions of the Jordan River, Lake Kinneret, Jaffa and the Zinn River Valley are exquisite. But his style doesn't always produce the desired results, as is evident in his rather dull, static portrayals of Masada, Mount Carmel and Avdat.

Still, this is a handsome coffee-table book. Art collectors and nature buffs will doubtless appreciate it.

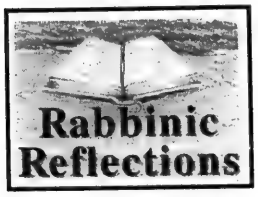
Air of spiritual yearning common during tshuvah



By RABBI
REUVEN TRADBURKS

At this time of year many of us think of spiritual growth. I don't mean the normal tshuvah process. This tshuvah is the main theme of Yom Kippur — we admit the mitzvot we have failed at, we regret these failures and we commit ourselves to avoiding these errors in the future. There is an air of spiritual yearning that we feel at this time of year.

What is this spiritual growth that we seek? Fulfilment of mitzvot is the religious experience par excellence in the Torah. However, there is an additional intangible quality of life, a reach beyond this world, a murmuring in the neshamah that we seek as well. This murmuring is a desire to infuse our daily lives with a sense of ultimate importance, or at least a sense of richness, of depth and of intensity. How can we achieve this deeper spirituality, this intensity?

I once spent a few moments with Rabbi Simcha Weinberg having what he called a spiritual check-up, the purpose of which was to infuse our daily lives with deeper spirituality. The first step in the check-up is to identify the most powerful moments of the past year. They may be the moment of seeing a child under the chupah, the pain of a loss, the sense of exhilaration at the completion of a project. This moment could be an intense moment of love, the transcendence of standing at the peak of a mountain, or a deep stirring in the heart on Yom Kippur. All of these are deep moments, spiritual moments when we experience life in its deepest sense.

The next step is to understand what these moments mean? In breaking down these experiences we understand what their essential elements mean. Exhilaration accompanying a particular accomplishment entails an affirmation of self, a feeling of individual worth, a sense of ability to overcome oneself or challenges.

The final step is to make this experience a part of daily life through association. Whenever I hear a particular song, I immediately flash back to driving in the car going skiing when I was a teenager. We all have these associations in our minds. We can use this idea of association to infuse our lives with greater spirituality. If we can take these intense moments of our past year and associate them with an action, we can continuously be drawing upon the intensity of those moments on a daily basis.

When we say Ashrei, perhaps we can associate the joy of a child's bar mitzvah. When we light Shabbat candles or say kid[illegible]sh, perhaps we can conjure up the [illegible]age of that moment of intense love. The Shema can lend itself to moments of grandeur. The brachot of healing the sick can be associated with a moment of good news over a recovery or a sense of longing for the relief of a friend or relative. Stepping up to t'filla, to prayer, can be infused with that sense of awe and dread of the Wall in Jerusalem.

The regular rhythym of Jewish life lends itself uniquely to infusing our lives with depth and spirituality. We must do our part to make our deeper moments part of our daily living. Perhaps for this season we can leave the radio off and drive in silence, reflecting on the depth that our lives possess and creating associations that will bring a deeper sense of the spiritual into the new year. The season of Rosh Hashanah is the ideal time for this spiritual reflection.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks is the spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah.

The Eyes of Tashlich
by Shel Krakofsky

mere hours after being dipped and engulfed in a mikvah of honey
the apple is now brown and sour obeying Micah's admonition inside out we turn our pockets and souls

pollute the cleansing stream flowing and scaled with the justice of cold-blooded fish their eyes always open nowhere a blink of forgiveness

we use crumbs of leavened bread teasing those fish to rise to the surface, shamelessly using sins for bait

our own necks up to water ablution incomplete
we try to reach Mount Moriah for a final thrust of trust next week we immerse ourselves beside the tainted hungry fish we thirst for purification

the fish, for our return

High Holidays — time to stand before the Creator

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

This month begins the Jewish New Year and the 10 days of repentance — the days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, when we evaluate ourselves and repent for the regretable actions of the past year.

We stand alone before our Creator as the judgement is formed and our fates are sealed. Yet we do not live our lives alone — those deeds for which we now repent were actions taken with a context. We have failed as parents, spouses, Jews or decent people. And yet, we negate these contexts and spend the 10 days, and Yom Kippur itself, immersed inside ourselves.

Why do we commit the sins in a context yet repent for them in a vacuum? This change can be somewhat understood when we broaden our view to include the midrash.

According to several midrashic statements, the first human — the Adam — was created on Rosh Hashanah, as was the woman. One opinion in Genesis Rabbah portrays the Adam as an androgenous being — that is, this Adam was equally male and female. Shortly thereafter, God splits Adam into two separate bodies, creating man and woman. Each half ultimately seeks the other to find their intended mate. From the time they are split, they function separately yet stand together. When Eve eats of the forbidden fruit the midrash states that the man also eats, since he views them as a unit and willingly chooses to share her fate. He commits his sin in the context of being her mate.

Through the ages, people have not changed significantly. We compromise on our independent opinions in order to keep peace in our homes. As Genesis states, we are not creatures who function alone or who live in isolation. We seek each other out and our actions are governed by the larger whole.

But when we evaluate ourselves, the liturgy does not leave room to say we were fulfilling our destinies. Why do we retreat from the larger picture during the most crucial 10 days of the year?

Perhaps the answer can be understood in the view found in Genesis Rabbah. The original Adam was a composite being that did not need to compromise for another, since it embodied its mate. But the Bible tells us that this being was lonely. It would live a life of solitude. God alleviates the loneliness by forming two separate beings. With this separation comes responsibility.

This is the key to the 10 days of repentance. The Adam was created on Rosh Hashanah and then physically separated. We likewise undergo a spiritual separation that begins with Rosh Hashanah. The rest of the year we function within a context; the people in our lives largely define our choices. Yet once a year for 10 days, we recreate the process of the first human being — we become separate. For 10 days, we remind ourselves that we have an answer to our loneliness, but we take the responsibility to step out of our daily worlds and stand alone before ourselves and our Creator.

Dealing with grief

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The question to ask when bad things happen to good people is not "Why?" but "What do I do now?"

That is the conclusion reached by Rabbi Harold Kushner, whose popular book Why do Bad Things Happen to Good People? was written partly as a response to the death of his own son.

Rabbi Kushner was speaking at Beth Tzedek Congregation, at a lecture to raise funds for victims and families of victims of Arab terror.

"You must take the white heat of your own pain and anger and make the world a better place," he said. "You must put the tragedy behind you, not to forget it, but to measure how far you have come."

Traditional answers to the eternal "why" — that G-d sends trials to those who can take it, that we somehow deserve what we get or that we simply can't understand His purposes — he finds not comforting at all.

The problem is laid out in the Book of Job, he said. People want to believe that G-d is all powerful, that He is perfectly righteous and that Job is a good person.

"You can't believe in all three ideals — you have to give away one of them."

Job's friends tried to convince him that he was actually a sinner, the classic response, Rabbi Kushner said, of blaming the victim.

"People would rather blame the victim than believe that there is unfairness in the world."

Job himself explained his plight by denying G-d's righteousness. "But if G-d isn't righteous, who teaches us to be compassionate and caring?" the rabbi asked.

Rabbi Kushner reached the conclusion, "reluctantly" that G-d is not all-powerful.

"Bad things happen to good people because the laws of nature don't distinguish between good and bad people. When G-d created the natural world, He withheld from it the blessing He shared only with us — the ability to distinguish between good and evil."

Janice Stein, a professor in the department of Political Science at the University of Toronto, introduced Rabbi Kushner. She said that the grief caused by terrorist acts is "one of the most painful griefs."

Terrorism, she said, is "planned, premeditated violence. The victim is not even the object of the violence — it can be anyone."

The victim is unknown and, from the terrorist's point of view, unimportant.

The intention, she said, is to cause fear and panic.

Rose Geist Goldstein, chair of the Israel action committee, said that the Beth Tzedec effort so far has raised $25,000 in direct aid to families in Israel.

Yiddish alive and well biz hundert tzvanzek

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Yiddish revival is alive and well, as is evident every second Tuesday at noon when a full-to-capacity group meet for lunch, camaraderie and above all, some Yiddish fun and mameloshen.

Toronto's newest Yiddish group, The Yiddish Club, was conceived by two friends who enjoyed exchanging some Yiddish remarks and jokes. But Victor Shields and Jack Bloomberg had no idea how successful their Yiddish gatherings would become when they booked the first luncheon at the Primrose Club last October.

"Our credo is feel good," says Shields who serves as the master of ceremonies. "The Yiddish Club has grown far beyond our expectations. The interest has been so phenomenal that we now have to limit the attendance — biz hundert und tzvanzek, to 120."

Bloomberg says the programs are presented mostly by the members — humor, music, videos and story telling.

"The tone set by Shields, whose Yiddish wit creates a relaxed fun-filled family mood," Bloomberg says. "Members, even those with less-than-proper Yiddish, do not hesitate to introduce themselves and their guests and some relish in adding a Yiddish joke or story."

The third member of the club executive is Jerry Bloom. Bloomberg and Bloom take care of the ever-growing mailing lists, send out notices and handle the finances.

"We understand the need for nostalgia that permeates the Jewish community today in Toronto," says Bloomberg. "We conceived a Yiddish club as a small group of 35 or 40 people who would meet for some light-hearted reminiscences and nostalgia. Our feel-good theme has attracted more than 300 people."

That we are meeting a need is evident "when young people and not so young people can meet comfortably while speaking and listening to Yiddish," he adds. "We feel good about it."

The programs have been varied. In August, the program was in the longstanding tradition of the Harry Harris Jewish Hour. Others have included a Western parody, a Mother's Day tribute, and a musical presentation titled Laughter and Tears. In September, Cantor Louis Danto will present a program called Freilich and Folk Music.

The organizers and program presenters include Fred Tittel, Bayla Chaikoff, Shirley Kumove, Mollie Bloomberg, Pearl Bloom, Marty Richman, Harvey Naftolin, Victor Topper, Muni Basman, Arnie Herschorn, Brenda Bloomberg, Anita and Albert Kerzner, Mel Kochberg, Al Franklin and Ken Silverberg.

The Three Year Vision

Community response 'amazing'

TORONTO -UJA canvassers have already raised $30 million as The Three Year Vision captures the Jewish community's imagination.

This year, for the first time, contributors are being asked to pledge not only for 1996, but for each of the following two years as well.

1996 UJA Campaign Co-chairs Charles Gold and Carol Kassel

"Ninety percent of those approached by UJA have responded positively to The Three Year Vision," reports Charles Gold, who, with Carol Kassel, is chairing the 1996 Campaign.

"It's amazing," adds Kassel. "It's beyond anything that we ever expected to happen. Everybody seems to really understand why we're doing it."

The Three Year Vision is designed to provide financial stability for educational and social services supported, through UJA, by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. It will also free up campaign time for volunteers to contact non-contributors and new contributors.

"We cannot rely only on our loyal existing donors to carry the burden of financing multiplying needs," notes Gold. "Unless our base of supporters expands, we will not be able to plan for the future without fear of financial failure."

UJA and Federation anticipate increased financial pressure on the community as provincial government cutbacks take effect. "That makes The Three Year Vision even more critical," says Kassel. "Those who need our help require a sense of security."

A thousand people propel UJA's largest launch yet

TORONTO - The ads invited the community to "do launch" and that's exactly what they did as UJA officially unfurled its 1996 Three Year Vision Campaign.

Over 1,000 people packed the Ford Centre for an original musical brought to Toronto from Israel by the UJA- funded Jewish Agency. The performance featured the DOR L'DOR singers and Hamilton's Laura Levin who narrated a true story about her search for Jewish discovery.

UJA Campaign co-chair Charles Gold described Toronto's Jewish community as "a model for the Jewish world."

"Jews want to live in Toronto. They want their children and grandchildren to grow up here," he said. "The Toronto Jewish community is the result of years of dedication - both volunteer and professional - to build a Jewish infrastructure supported by a generous donor community." Gold's counterpart, Carol Kassel, stressed the need for a "new vision" to carry the community into the future. UJA's new Three Year Vision, she said, would allow the community to maintain assistance for 23,000 people below the poverty line and cope with the demands imposed by skyrocketing growth.

Julia Koschitzky, who chairs Keren Hayesod's Board speaks to Laura Levin.

"There are 43,000 Jews living north of Steeles," she noted. "It's an area that we've barely begun to service." Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto President Sandra Brown focused on Jewish values as a top Federation priority. "What could better symbolize the value of tzedaka," she asked, " than UJA?"

Lining up for Launch. Crowds gathered early for the official kick-off of UJA Campaign '96.

Rabbis play important role in UJA campaign

By Rose Heilbronn

TORONTO - By including rabbis in its 1996 campaign, United Jewish Appeal is, according to co-chair Charles Gold, changing the direction of the Jewish community.

Headed up by Rabbi Moshe Stern of Shaare Tefillah Cogregation and Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah, a special committee of congregational rabbis has played a key role in shaping the new campaign and The Three Year Vision.

For years, rabbis have supported UJA from their pulpits but last year the organization created a formal structure for their participation.

"UJA is the umbrella and safety net of our community," insists Rabbi Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Allen is also president of Toronto's Board of Rabbis.

"It is the overriding organization, concerned not with personal special interests, but with the general interest of the entire community. Its objectives are strategic and historic, like saving Jews from disparate locations where anti-Semitism is rampant."

Rabbi Stern, from Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue, who is President of Toronto's Vaad Harabanim, stressed the importance of supporting UJA, because in Toronto, it is the major source of funding for Jewish education. He says "the Orthodox position has always been that the only real solution for Jewish continuity is Jewish education.

"Anyone who cares about the future of the Jewish people will understand that supporting UJA is an absolute imperative."

Agreeing with Rabbi Stern is Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec, Toronto's largest Conservative synagogue. Frydman-Kohl is on the Federation's Board of Trustees and is the rabbinic adviser to UJA's Women's Campaign. He is also chairman of Keren Hayesod's Rabbinic Campaign.

"What we are seeing in North America," he says, "is an awareness that by working together we can achieve much more than by working alone."

"Formally involving the rabbis is part of building a new vision for Toronto's Jewish community. We are building a sense of an integrated community," says Carol Kassel, the other co-chair of this year's campaign.

"We are building bridges," explains Kassel. "We felt it was important for the rabbis to understand how we fundraise and we, in turn, needed their input from their communities."

Community Matters

UJA Super Sunday

It's time to answer the call

By Adi Waksman

Toronto's biggest one day fundraising event is doing something a little different this year. UJA's 14th annual Super Sunday fundraising blitz, October 1st, is asking contributors to join The Three Year Vision.

UJA will be asking donors to pledge not only for 1996 but for each of the following two years as well.

"Every year the campaign loses millions of dollars because there isn't enough time to contact everyone. Canvassers end up spending most of their time talking with existing donors about their annual pledge and don't get a chance to reach out to potential new contributors," says Super Sunday co-chair Miriam Rosenberg. "The Three Year Vision will give them the opportunity."

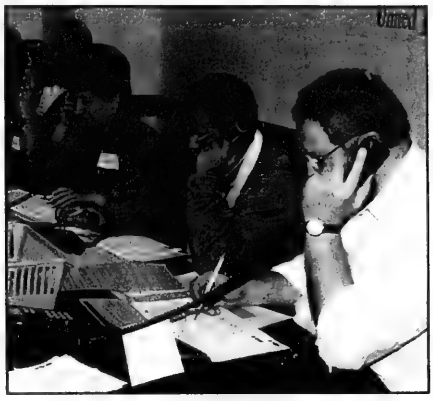
"Three year financial commitments will provide the stability and security needed to meet the community's growing needs and to plan ahead," added Bill Kassel, the other co-chair.

Other Campaign improvements coinciding with the new Three Year Vision include more intensive training for canvassers and nurturing a more personal relationship with donors.

Volunteers have also been extensively educated about the benefits of the Three Year Vision and how UJA funds community services. "They'll be able to tell donors exactly where the money goes," stresses Rosenberg.

Some 500 volunteers will be making 40,000 calls to 20,000 households during the twelve hour marathon. Last year, Super Sunday collected $2.6 million in pledges.

Super Sunday begins at 9 a.m. on October 1 at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street. For more information or to become a Super Sunday volunteer, call (416) 635-2883, ext. 177.



On October 1st, over 500 dedicated volunteers will be on the phones at this year's UJA Super Sunday.

Shalom Toronto heads toward 10th anniversary

TORONTO - After nearly a decade of dispensing warmth and good wishes to new Torontonians, Shalom Toronto's energy is hardly flagging.

A corps of 30 greeters is always on call to deliver friendship, advice and a gift basket to Jewish community arrivals.

Since January, 1986, when the Jewish Women's Federation began Shalom Toronto, the program has welcomed over 1200 Jewish men and women to the Greater Toronto area. During the last decade, immigrants have accounted for 45% of Toronto's Jewish population growth.

"If someone has problems or needs answers to questions, Shalom Toronto will help," says Paula Bass, one of the program's greeters, who was once a recipient of Shalom Toronto hospitality.

"Many people in Toronto have not moved a lot, so they don't necessarily know what it's like to live in a city without family and friends," adds Bass. "Shalom Toronto is a friendly voice."

Now that she's no longer a rookie Torontonian, Bass also sees bigger benefits from enthusiastically welcoming newcomers. "If you create a warm and caring Jewish community, why would anyone want to intermarry?," she wonders.

Program co-chair Sylvia Peck, who with Reesa Sud oversees Shalom Toronto, became involved because of her parents' immigrant experience.

"My parents were Holocaust survivors who didn't have Canadian friends when they came here. Everyone talked down to them," Peck recalls.

Today, when Shalom Toronto tries to relieve the discomfort of moving to unfamiliar surroundings, just about everyone is very appreciative.

"They're so receptive because they want to meet new people," stresses Peck. "One woman even made a luncheon for everyone who had been nice to her after she arrived."

If you would like to become a Shalom Toronto volunteer or know of someone new to the city, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 135.

Community Matters

A century of Federation assistance for the poor

By Howard English

TORONTO - In the mid-30's, when $15 was a respectable weekly wage, the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies spent $35,000 a year on supplementary financial assistance to our community's poor. Today, the figure exceeds $1 million, but the tradition has been unbroken.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto still funds financial supplements for disadvantaged Jews in Toronto.

"Helping the Jewish poor is an ancient practice," says Dr. Stephen Speisman, Director of the Ontario Jewish Archives. "Women took the lead in this."

As early as the mid-1800's, voluntary societies had formed to assistance the economically disadvantaged. By 1912, there was a multi-service agency to organize the community's charitable efforts.

"Someone could call a central number and the case would be given to one of the societies," notes Speisman. However, it was the Great Depression, starting in 1929, that, according to Speisman, posed the greatest challenge to community tzedaka.

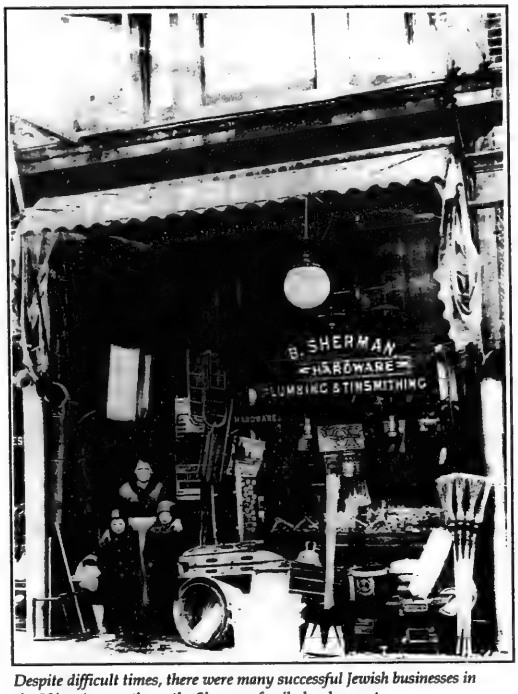
"The Depression was the watershed which spurred municipal authorities into creating a welfare department. For a long time, Jews did not want to have any part of it."

But, as life became tougher, for many there was no choice but to accept welfare cheques and supplementary assistance from the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies.

"The majority of Jews were working class people," says Speisman. "We're talking about working people losing their jobs and struggling to make ends meet."

Despite the dent in the Jewish community treasury left by supplementing welfare payments, virtually no one, to the best of Speisman's knowledge opposed the expenditure.

"It was just considered the appropriate thing to do."



Despite difficult times, there were many successful Jewish businesses in the 30's. Among them, the Sherman family hardware store.

Physicians form advisory board

By Marcie Somers

TORONTO - This year, UJA's Physician's Division has enlisted some of Toronto's most prominent specialists on a new Advisory Board.

Physicians will be receiving a campaign letter signed by one of the Advisory Board Members.

According to Dr. Steven Gottesman, who co-chairs the Physician's Division with Dr. Howard Price, the Advisory Board was created to bring together prominent doctors, already involved in the Jewish community, who would help design campaign strategies.

Currently, 28 doctors from a variety of specialties, sit on the Board, including Dr. Arnold Noyek, head of the ear, nose and throat department at Mount Sinai Hospital, cardiovascular surgeon Dr. Bernard Goldman and internist Dr. Abraham Rapoport.

Gottesman sees their participation as an excellent way to motivate fellow physicians to donate both time and money to UJA.

"If the positive response we received from the physicians we called to establish the Board is any indication, it looks as though their involvement will provoke a great deal of interest among those in the medical profession."

Gottesman believes many of his peers will join The Three Year Vision, despite doctors' concerns about how government policies will affect their financial security.

"We think The Three Year Vision is a great way for people to budget accordingly," he says, "and know that they have helped UJA for the next three years."

Over 1,300 doctors who belong to the Physicians Division raised over $1.5 million last year. With the formation of the Advisory Board and The Three Year Vision, they hope to increase the Division's membership by 15%.

What a Launch!

UJA's Campaign '96 liftoff at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, the first to which the entire community was invited, became the talk of the town. Here's a look at some of the people who made the Community Campaign Launch such a huge success.

All aboard. Neil Nisker (left), a past campaign chair, joins his wife Rachel with Honey Sherman and husband Barry.

UJA Campaign Associate Lissie Strauss Sanders is busy in the theatre cockpit.

Launch co-chairs Norm Godfrey and Vicki Campbell finally relax after months of preparation.

No future for mountain Jews

TORONTO - The 'Mountain Jews' of the former Soviet Union may soon be a footnote in history, according to Yaroslav Waintraub, the Jewish Agency emissary for the area. Waintraub was on a UJA speaking tour in Toronto last week.

The 60,000 'Mountain Jews' have been living for centuries in various remote regions of the FSU between the Black Sea and Caspian Sea. With the collapse of the Soviet regime, according to Waintraub, there is no future for these people.

"Certain daily services, such as schools and transportation that once existed, are no more," he said. "Based on the daily visits to our offices and the interest that is shown when I go into these remote regions, I expect that most of these 60,000 Jews will emigrate to Israel in the next few years."

Based in Pyatigorsk, 2000 miles from Moscow, Waintraub is also responsible for the Jews of war torn Chechnya, from which 300 have been rescued this year, by the Jewish Agency. They were brought to the Agency compound in the Caucasus, where they wait anywhere between three and seven months for an exit visa to Israel.

"We provide them with food, lodging and Hebrew lessons while they wait to get their passports," he said. "There are approximately 40 people living on the compound, with another 100 scattered around the country staying with family and friends until their visas come through. About 160 people have already emigrated to Israel."

Recruited by a friend who thought he would be the perfect man for the job, Waintraub frequently flirts with danger. "I have been in many life-threatening situations," he recalled, "but by far the worst was when the Russian police rounded up the inhabitants on the compound and threatened to arrest everyone. They knew that there were Chechnyians living in this compound, but were unaware of the deal I had struck with the local KGB, who had agreed to let them stay until they got their passports. After showing them my papers, explaining who I was, and offering them a little money, they eventually left. I can breathe easy about it now, but back then it was very scary."

Yaroslav Waintraub

Waintraub, like most Jewish Agency emissaries is motivated by far more than money. He believes it's a moral duty to quickly resettle Jews from his territory in Israel.

"Time is running out for these people. My only hope is that I can get them out before it is too late. That's why your UJA gift is so important, so precious."

The Jewish Agency and UJA continue to charter dozens of flights each week from the former Soviet Union.

In the spring of 1996, thousands of Jewish youth from all corners of the world will gather together in Poland and Israel for an experience that will last a lifetime.

Not All Jewish Funerals Are Created Equal.

Most Jewish funerals have elements in common: the traditional religious requirements, the eulogy, burial in a Jewish cemetery, the shiva...

What sets us apart, as a non-profit, community-based organization, is our philosophy. We don't believe that you should measure your love or respect for the deceased by how much you spend on the casket or the funeral. Our only goal is to help you and your family plan a funeral that is meaningful to you.

For complete details, ask for our Jewish information folder, or call our Jewish Funeral Consultant, Harvey Poch at (416) 441-1580.

Services, including transfer and shelter of the deceased, shemirah, taharah, linen shrouds, simple all-wood coffin, funeral coach, chapel or synagogue service —$1,950. Higher and lower cost options also available.

Under the chupah, Lawrie Cherniak, accompanied by his wife Debbie, carries the newly completed Torah to B'nai Torah synagogue.

Family dedicates sefer Torah in memory of their son

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — People celebrated and danced outside North York's B'nai Torah Congregation at a recent hachnosos sefer Torah, but it was an event filled with mixed emotions.

The hachnosos was in memory of 24-year-old Michael Jay Cherniak, who died four months ago just a week after undergoing a kidney transplant.

"He was sick all his life but he never said, 'why me?' He never complained," his father, Lawrie Cherniak told The CJN. "Wherever Michael went, there was laughter and joy. He had a tremendous sense of humor."

Cherniak thanked Rabbi Raphael Marcus, Izzie Kaplan, Arthur Rosenblum and Paul Halberstadt for initiating the fundraiser to buy the new Torah in Michael's memory, and committing B'nai Torah to subsidize the purchase.

"That's the kind of thing you would pray for, but not necessarily afford to do," Cherniak said. "Michael touched so many people" that there were enough donations from the community for the subsidy from B'nai Torah to be unnecessary, he said.

"The response of friends and community are a tribute of the highest order," Rabbi Marcus told the 600 people assembled in the sanctuary. "Michael was a great teacher to us and a rebbe. The most miraculous event of life, we took for granted. He was at peace with his lot."

Rabbi Baruch Taub of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation, a close friend of the family, said the hachnosos sefer Torah had a double purpose: "to give koved to Torah and at the same time, reduce a little bit of the pain and anguish this family feels and that we all feel."

Cherniak thanked the community for their support. There was not a dry eye in the room when he read I had a Friend, a poem written by Joan Bovelle, a non-Jewish woman stricken with kidney disease who had been on the same dialysis schedule as Michael for three years. The two came from very different worlds but forged a friendship.

"Michael was a good person who loved G-d and people. He treated everyone with love and respect," Cherniak said. "He appreciated life. I hope that through memories of Michael many people will learn to appreciate life and love people."

Lawrie Cherniak inscribes the last few letters of a sefer Torah which was dedicated in memory of his son Michael.

Branson Hospital gets new chapel

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Doors with impressive stained glass windows lead the way into the new Bodenstein Rogow chapel on the third floor of the North York Branson hospital.

The chapel was dedicated Sept. 14 in a ceremony which included greetings from five rabbis as well as hospital board chairman Karnik Doukmetzian.

The chapel has subdued decorations, stained glass on the walls and gracefully designed ark. It was financed primarily by Ken Bodenstein, CEO of Steeles Memorial Chapel (SMC); Mike Rogow, SMC president; Tefilin Charitable Organization; Peter and Rosie Bodenstein; Norm Black; and Adath Shalom Synagogue.

The mezuzzah was affixed by Henry Lederman and the ceremony chaired by John H. Pollock.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman said the chapel recognizes that both Seventh Day Adventists, who operate the hospital, and the Jewish faith hold Shabbat to be a day of rest and healing. A non-denominational room for patients and relatives is adjacent to the chapel.

Rabbi Moshe Stern said because a mechitza to separate men and women has been included, the chapel is sensitive to the needs of the Orthodox patients.

Bringing greetings from Conservative and Reform congregations, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl said he is sure the chapel will also bring comfort to secular patients and relatives.

Also taking part were rabbis Ronald Weiss and Raphael Marcus.

JVS rethinking services as 50th anniversary nears

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) is gearing up for its 50th anniversary in 1997.

But JVS president Peter Shenfield says it is time to rethink the service and change the way it runs.

"The world is constantly changing, but something we can count on is that financial support from the government will be diminished," he said at the recent 48th annual meeting in Metro Hall.

He told board members and JVS staff that in its early stages, the agency was set up to help immigrants and Holocaust survivors.

"People were helped and jobs were found and today the needs continue to exist. To obtain employment today means understanding new and changing concepts about jobs. Employers and customers have higher expectations; compensation packages and systems are under review; and working relationships with peers and supervisors are under transformation.

"Governments are redirecting their resources so that the social safety net is no longer as wide and deep as it once was. Without doubt, more people will fall through the net. Who will be there to give them a hand?" he asked.

"We have been preparing for these times and we realize it is now time to direct the agency towards a partnership with the community," he said. "We need to work directly with groups to help them develop job search skills and find new employers."

JVS executive director Ed Segalowitz agreed that the funding environment is under significant strain and conceded that "change brings fear. The agency has prepared for this change, however, and our challenge is to ensure the existence of an infrastructure of dedicated staff and volunteers.

"When an agency faces turbulence, continued survival depends on direction. As long as we know where we want to go, we will pass through the turbulence with ease," he said.

In the agency's annual report, Shenfield and Segalowitz said in the past year, the board and staff have engaged in an agency-wide process, setting guiding principles and values.

"Through the leadership of Norman Halpern, Paul Chan and other members of the board and staff, we have identified a core set of principles which provide the foundation for our decision making. Task groups have been established to review key areas of concern and to identify the directions and actions which can strengthen the agency's operations."

Kirk Wisemayer, chair of the 50th anniversary programming committee, said it has planned a series of events "that will both celebrate the past and look to the future. These events aim to bring together those already involved with JVS and to reach others who might benefit."

Volunteers awards were presented to Suzanne Rittenberg, Lisa Borden and Rosario Obregon. Sheila Burke, Dorothy Till and Zelda Melamed received staff awards. Annette Bidlofsky, a former member of the Women in New Roles Program, and Yonina Tenenbaum, who took part in employment and career counselling, praised the agency for giving them the skills and assurance to find jobs.

Radio commentary prompts CRTC complaint

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress has filed a formal complaint with the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) about an on-air commentary by CHUM Radio personality Brian Henderson that blamed Jews for Ontario's legal aid crisis.

And the Jewish organization is asking CHUM Radio to terminate the broadcaster's employment.

Congress spokesman Manuel Prutschi called Henderson's early morning commentary "unadulterated anti-Semitism" and "ugly and bigoted comments."

He said an apology broadcast by CHUM Radio president Jim Waters fell far short of addressing the issues raised by Henderson's statement.

"Our main point is that the station has not yet sent out a loud and clear message that anti-Semitic diatribes don't belong on the air. They haven't sent that message to the public or their employees," Prutschi said.

Henderson's Sept. 14 commentary stated: "Provincial Attorney General Charles Harnick may not realize it but the root cause of the crisis in the Legal Aid system is Jewish mothers...Jewish mothers are infamous for advising their offspring to become doctors or dentists or lawyers, or marry a doctor or dentist or lawyer, and the result is we have too many of all three in this province, most especially lawyers."

Henderson went on to suggest that lawyers hang around courts and "pick up enough business from the poor, the indigent, the disadvantaged, the confused immigrants...to earn a pretty decent income — most of it at taxpayer's expense."

He concluded by quoting "a Jewish proverb" about milking a cow for all its worth.

Apology fell far short

The commentary prompted a trio of Jewish organizations to condemn CHUM for putting it on the air.

B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant said the commentary "linked Jews to dishonest business practices" and used "an age-old technique of Jew-baiting."

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, called the piece "a shameful, insensitive, provocative piece of anti-Semitism."

Responding quickly to the criticism, Waters apologized on the air the same day.

"As far as we at CHUM are concerned, Henderson is in no way anti-Semitic and has, in past commentaries, been very supportive of the Jewish community. We at CHUM group radio are very concerned about any feelings that we or our employees harbor any anti-Semitic feelings.

"Such is just not the case. We are deeply concerned that the remarks made on our radio station may have offended any of our listeners. We can only ask those who were offended...to accept our most sincere apologies."

Prutschi said Congress was not satisfied with the station's response. Waters did not acknowledge that Henderson's comment was, in fact, an "anti-Semitic diatribe. They haven't disassociated themselves from the statement and made no declaration that it is offensive to the station and management.

"All they've said is the guy is not an anti-Semite...They just apologized to whomever was offended," Prutschi said.

A more conciliatory tone was adopted by B'nai Brith, though Dimant called Waters' apology "weak."

"We are disappointed with [its] wording...But we want to move forward in our efforts to make Toronto a community free from racial and religious bias."

Prutschi said Congress would not withdraw its CRTC complaint even if CHUM strengthens its apology. "We want it on their record to show what the station has done," he said.

Waters did not return CJN phone calls.

Bletl Street irregulars Yiddishize Holmes

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The innovative Friends of Yiddish have come up with another winner — a Yiddish translation of Sherlock Holmes!

A banner breakfast turnout of 150 at the Primrose Club recently heard the Bletl Street Irregulars, composed of Michael Lebovic, Allen Farkas and Blema Steinman say Frishtik, Mayn Tayerer Vatson as they portrayed the antics of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's detective.

They illustrated a scholarly lecture by lawyer Clifford Goldfarb, a former president of the Sherlock Holmes club in Toronto.

"It is impossible to describe Sir Arthur Conan Doyle as anti-Semitic," said Goldfarb. "There is nothing of Shylock in Doyle's Jewish characters, but he jars us with his descriptions of Jews. In his defence, it is the language his characters would have used at that time."

That time included the Alien Act of 1905 which placed restrictions on Jews who lived in Britain and an overcrowded East End of London with 100,000 Jews in 1914.

Spiritualist practising Doyle had only a few Jewish friends, Goldfarb said, one of whom, the famed Harry Houdini, couldn't convince Doyle that his (Houdini's) magical tricks were phoney.

Though Houdini was at first moved by a message Doyle and his wife said they received from Houdini's dead mother, the magician later recanted, citing the fact that Doyle received the message in English, while Houdini's mother knew only Yiddish.

Lillian Friendly-Eigles and other members of the Friends of Yiddish executive wore attire common to the era of the pipe-smoking detective.

גידי קורן

כגודל הציפיות:

זוכרים את הטיול הראשון שלכם לפאריז? מגדל אייפל, ארמון אליזה וכמובן - מוזיאון הלובר. ובמוזיאון - מליוני תמונות על פני מסדרונות ארוכים שממש לא עניינו אתכם. אתם, כמו כולם, הלכתם לשם כדי להגיד אחר כך שראיתם אותה במו עיניכם. אותה - כמובן את המונה ליזה. אחרי חיפושים ודשדושי רגליים הגעתם לאולם גדול שהיו בו המון אנשים שנדחקו כדי להביט בתמונה קטנה. ואתם, כמו כמעט כולם התכלכלתם בתמונה, ואחר כך היבטתם אחד בשני ואמרתם: "מה, זה הכל?!"

אנשי החימר וסימני הזמן:

"קרמיקה" מתחרו אצל רובנו עם כלי אוכל, אגרטלים ושאר קישוטים ששמים על שולחנות. לכן יכול להיות לכם מעניין לראות את תערוכת "סימני ומניני" בגלריית John B Aird ב- 900 Bay St..

סיפור קטן לראש השנה:

נכון שבית הספר נועד להכין אותנו לחיים? ונכון שרוב הדברים שאנחנו לומדים בבית הספר אין להם שום קשר למה שיקרה לנו אחר-כך בחיים? לדוגמא - נותנים לנו חצוצרה או קרן יער או קלרינט למשך שנתיים ומלמדים אותנו לנשוף, ובמשך מספר ענונות אנו משתייכים לתזמורת בית הספר שמזייפת אנושות במסיבת סוף השנה. אז הינה - לפני איזה זמן סיפרתי לחבר טוב שהכלי המוסיקאלי שלי במשך כל הילדות היה קרן יער, כלי קשה במיוחד. חייך החבר ואמר: תשמע סיפור, ניגנתי שנתיים על קרן בבית הספר וממש לא אהבתי את זה. והינה עכשיו, אחרי הרבה שנים, לקח אבי בהתקף לב ואושפו ימים ספורים לפני ראש השנה. אבי מאוד התעצב על שאינו יכול לבקר בבית הכנסת בימים הנוראים, להתפלל ולהאזין לשופר. הבאתי שופר לבית החולים, ובגלל קרן היער - ידעתי איך לתקוע בשופר, ולא היה קץ לאושרו של אבי. רואים? נפלאות דרכי האלוהים, ואפילו נגינת הקרן בבית הספר הכינה את חברי לחיים.

אין כמו הורים ישראלים לדאוג לעתיד ילדיהם. התחרות מתחילה מוקדם מאוד ושמעתי אפילו שבשכונות היוקרה יש אנשים שרושמים את הילדים עוד בהריון לגן מונטסורי. וכמובן - אחר כך עושים השוואות מי עושה מה יותר מהר. היו לי חברים שמאוד התגאו שהילדה שלהם בת השנתיים עומדת שעות ומביטה בתמונה של ואן גוך שתלויה היתה בסאלון. יום אחד, כשהתחילה הילדה לדבר, שאלה אותה אמא הגאה בנוכחות אורחים רבים: "תגידי, רוחלי'ה, מה את כל כך אוהבת בתמונה הזו?" ענתה לה רוחלי'ה: "את המסמר הגדול..."

To all my friends who tell me they recognize my face in CJN and even can read my name; I hope next year you will find more time to work on your Hebrew, so you can share my thoughts, too.

Bathurst Manor residents fight club liquor license

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A liquor licence for a $3-million night club on Dufferin Street midway between Finch and Sheppard is being opposed by many of the nearby residents of Bathurst Manor.

An adjourned hearing for the licence request will resume Oct. 24 at 10 a.m. at the North York City Council chambers, possibly a day-long affair, open to the public. The chair of the licence board hearing is Andromache Karakatsanis.

Opposition to the licence is being led by Ward 7 Councillor Mike Feldman and Metro Councillor Howard Moscoe, who along with resident Gary Kenez, have standing at the hearing to cross-examine applicant Mark Hazout, president of Luxor Entertainment Corp.

The intended Luxor Club includes a large banquet hall and dance floor, a restaurant, a sports club with billiard tables, food and bar service and a wall-sized TV picture screen, and a travel agency. It is zoned for 3,095 patrons, though operating manager Alessandro M. Motto says its total capacity would be 2,500.

Hazout told The CJN that his company has already spent $1.5 million on converting the former Idomo warehouse, and the total investment of $3 million includes $1 million for state of the art lighting and sound.

In Hazout's opinion, a building permit has not been issued for the project owing to "political implications. We have complied with everything," he said.

"It's a glitch in the building bylaws of North York which allows a club in this industrial area," said Feldman. He said he is absolutely opposed to a night club and its attendant noise and traffic in this location and that the bylaw did not envision this kind of club.

A motion by Feldman opposing a "mega night club" for the site was approved unanimously by North York Council July 12.

"This will be as big as O'Keefe Centre. It will hold twice the population of Mackenzie Collegiate. Can you imagine the trouble if only 10 per cent of its patrons get drunk?" asked Moscoe.

The Luxor Club's Mark Hazout is facing opposition from local ratepayers.

Opposition to the Luxor club has spread through the adjoining residential and business areas like wildfire, Moscoe said.

For his part, Hazout, 31, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), who came to Canada from Morocco with his parents at the age of four, says Luxor is a legitimate business venture.

It will add to North York's tax base, employ 120 people, and he is investing "every penny I own," including a substantial sum gained from the sale of a restaurant-bar he owned on the airport strip, he said.

Asked if it was true, as alleged by some residents, that he is only a "front man" for other interests, Hazout said: "Absolutely not."

In a statement faxed to The CJN Motto declared: "We feel we have been falsely labelled by members of the community through either political or personal motives and we are currently investigating the source of slanderous information regarding this venture."

On its own property, Luxor will have 173 parking spaces, including a new parking lot holding 120, but has agreements from nearby businesses to permit another 800 cars to park, Motto said.

This does not satisfy Feldman, who says he wants a "total impact study" on the parking problem.

Part of the money spent so far is on impressive Egyptian friezes, including four sphinxes and a pyramid scene, which decorate all the rooms and were executed by artist Frederico Tikui. The club is named after the second largest city in Egypt and its name is well suited to suggest the luxury and opulence of its surroundings, Hazout said.

Replying to complaints of late noise and traffic, Motto said operating hours for the club will be 7 p.m. to 3 a.m. But the age of the customers, 25 to 40, no liquor being served after 1.30 a.m., and patrons leaving in small groups will mitigate the problem.

"We hope to attract mature people with disposable income who want a nice place to relax, perhaps rekindle a romance," Motto said.

Luxor is holding an open house Oct. 8 and sending out 10,000 invitations to residents and businesses. A previous open house, to which only 500 were invited, only attracted 12 people.

Pre-recorded music will be used in the club, restaurant and sports bar, and an expensive sound attenuation padding system will soften the noise, Motto said. Live performances will only be held three or four times a year for special events.

The cover charge for the club is $20, but Motto said memberships are available for $30, and a VIP membership for a few hundred dollars will allow other privileges. The restaurant, seating 115 persons, will offer a luncheon menu costing about $18.

Moscoe said there are two synagogues in the area, several schools, including CHAT, and a seniors housing project right opposite the club site.

"It will degrade the quality of life in this area and lower property values," said Kenez, who resides on Overbrook Place, a street which ends just opposite the Luxor. "It will create a tremendous amount of traffic."

Congress president addresses community

Greetings from the president of Canadian Jewish Congress

As we look towards the New Year 5756, our community remains united on the principal elements of the Canadian Jewish agenda. However, this does not mean we can take any of the challenges ahead lightly. We continue to combat incidents of anti-Semitism and racism and urge the government to move quickly on suspected Nazi war criminals resident in our country. With a referendum on sovereignty looming in Quebec, Canadian Jewry must play a significant role in the national unity debate.

Jewish continuity stands out as a truly important element of our agenda. As my predecessor Irving Abella said: "We must try to build a Jewish community that is not simply concerned with survival, but one that is creative and attractive to our children — a community with substance and content." It is of paramount importance that we empower youth to become the leaders of tomorrow.

Remembering the Holocaust remains our sacred duty and we owe it to those who perished and to those who survived to carry forth their message to our children and to our grandchildren. We must unrelentingly pursue Holocaust deniers. And we must ensure that our governments and other governments continue to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. We cannot do this alone. There has been some movement since last March on the war crimes dossier, but time is running out.

The Canadian Jewish community continues to support the democratically elected government of Israel. It is not our role to dictate to the Israeli government how to conduct its affairs. If Israel's agreement with the PLO does eventually lead to the end of violence and the establishment of a true peace, then all parties win.

On the subject of national unity, Canada is one of the greatest countries in the world. Unfortunately, separatists would choose to divide our nation. We must let those who would divide us know, in no uncertain terms, that Canadian Jews stand for a united Canada. As Jews, we benefit from a strong country. Responsible leadership means saying No to separatists and working forcefully to ensure that Canada remains united. When addressing those who seek to break up this country, it is vital to be honest about our commitment to Canada. Earning respect on the question of national unity requires friendly discussion, but frank expression of our support for Canada.

Regarding racism and anti-Semitism, from the Ku Klux Klan and the Heritage Front to Ernst Zundel, Malcolm Ross and neo-Nazis, we must remain vigilant. Internationally, the world picture has changed in ways one would never have envisioned and the changes have had a direct impact on Jews in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe.

Nonetheless, our job is by no means complete. Atrocities continue to be committed in the former Yugoslavia. Genocide has occurred or is being pursued in places like Rwanda, Burma and Somalia. The small Jewish community of Cuba cannot emigrate and needs our assistance with food and other provisions.

Let us hope that the Jewish community worldwide enjoys a happy, peaceful and fulfilling 5756.

Embassy's message

Message from the Embassy of Israel by Eli Yerushalmi.

Eli Yerushalmi

Dear Friends,

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are two of the most important holidays of our people. These are days of spiritual elation, days of examination of our conscience and days of soul searching. During the 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the most solemn days of our tradition, soul searching acquires a sublime value. We rigorously examine our conscience, our acts and our conduct.

Our prayers and the exchange of Rosh Hashanah greetings are the timeless expression of community, interdependence and responsibility which have been the hallmark of Jewish life at this time of the year for generations, wherever Jewish people have lived.

These are the prayers which ask to be remembered for long, healthy, rewarding years. These are the prayers of our forebearers and the hopes of our children. These are prayers of thanks.

To the Jewish people of Canada, exemplary in understanding that sense of community, I would like to join all of you in praying for a good year, a year of personal health, fulfilment and reward, a year that will strengthen the unity among all the Jewish people in Israel and around the world, a year which will bring us forward in the negotiations for peace with all the neighbors of Israel and enhance its security and economic progress.

On behalf of the Government of Israel, its people and my family, I extend warm wishes for health, happiness, fulfilment, rewarding life and the answer to our prayers, peace. Shanah Tovah.

Germany's Jewish population expected to reach 100,000

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite an upsurge in anti-Semitism, Germany's Jewish community is growing, and will likely have a Jewish population of about 100,000 by the year 2000, says a member of the governing body of German Jewry.

Sixty thousand Jews currently live in Germany. But with the continued influx of Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union, which has been running at a rate of 10,000 annually, the number of Jews is expected to rise to approximately 100,000 by the turn of the millennium.

The forecast was made in an interview by Michel Friedman, who at 39 is the youngest member of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

Friedman — the son of Polish-born Holocaust survivors who were saved by the legendary Oskar Schindler — was in Toronto last week to deliver a speech sponsored by the Centre of Jewish Studies and the German Studies program at York University. His visit here was under the auspices of the German Consulate, with the assistance of the Goethe Institute. Before leaving Canada, he also spoke in Montreal.

Friedman, who was born in Paris and resides in Frankfurt, said the Central Council of Jews in Germany does not encourage Jews to settle in Germany. But once they arrive, the community does its best to integrate them.

Most Soviet newcomers are deficient in Jewish knowledge, customs and rites. "But they are interested in learning and they learn quickly," noted Friedman, a lawyer with a doctorate in law.

Due to the past and even the present, Jews live in Germany with "a certain degree of fear" and ambivalence, he acknowledged.

Nevertheless, he added, the Jewish presence — which is less than a quarter of the size it was before the Third Reich — is an unalterable fact.

There were 1,366 registered anti-Semitic incidents in Germany in 1994, a 127 per cent increase over the previous year.

"It's no secret that anti-Semitism didn't end with the Nazis," Friedman said. "And it's no secret that neo-Nazism, worldwide, has grown."

But Friedman is not unduly

Michel Friedman

alarmed. Germany, he pointed out, has evolved into a stable, democratic state. And the German government is committed to combating anti-Semitism and racism.

Germans, he declared, are not more anti-Semitic than the British or the French. Jews in Germany, he said, should neither underestimate nor overestimate anti-Semitism. And they should engage in a dialogue with the majority of Germans who are opposed to it.

Anti-Semitism has grown since German unification in 1990 because joblessness has increased and minorities are more visible, he explained.

Friedman urged the Ministry of Education to introduce new courses dealing with minority groups and tolerance and to pay more attention to the phenomenon of multiculturalism. Furthermore, he said, police forces must be more efficient in cracking down on neo-Nazi organizations.

Friedman expressed concern about the new prominence of Germany's right-wing intellectual movement. It emphasizes German nationalism and compares the Holocaust to other tragedies in history.

Although this movement does not deny the Holocaust, it is "far more dangerous" than neo-Nazism because it can change attitudes to the past and influence today's moral climate, he said.

Friedman is hopeful that the planned Holocaust memorial in Berlin, whose construction has been delayed by disputes, will be built shortly.

He criticized German state governments for cutting subsidies to former concentration camps that function as Holocaust museums.

Friedman came out in favor of German participation in a Western military force to stop ethnic cleansing in Bosnia.

"Germany doesn't have to send bombers. It can be involved in logistical, intelligence and medical work."

Jewishness celebrated

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Orthodox and secular, Jewish women gathered here recently in a common rejoicing in their Jewishness.

Called A Celebration of Jewish Women's Voices, the event was a follow-up to last year's vigil in support of agunot, women refused a get (Jewish divorce) by their husbands, which was spearheaded by Na'amat.

The vigil was so successful in bringing Jewish women's organizations together in a common cause that many felt there should be other programs in which all groups could participate, said Na'amat president, Wendy Schneider, chair of the organizing committee.

Over 80 women attended the evening in the lounge of Shalom Village Nursing Home including professional women and homemakers, Holocaust survivors and Jews-by-choice, Shalom Village residents in their 80s and 90s, teenagers and girls as young as nine or 10.

The program included readings and songs, discussion circles for the sharing of thoughts and feelings about being Jewish and what the participants would like to pass on to the next generation.

Frequently mentioned were growing up in a traditional Jewish home; keeping a kosher home; lighting Friday night candles and the observance of holidays; a Jewish education; love of learning; the Yiddish heritage and language; and warmth of the Jewish family.

Helen Metz, one of the organizers, said there was "a connectedness in our similarities as well as in our differences."

Plight of Vancouver's Jews called a 'national imperative'

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — National attention and resources are required to meet the challenge of building a vibrant Canadian West Coast centre of Jewish life in Vancouver, declares a report on the community prepared for the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV).

The report, just released, says the Vancouver situation must not be treated by Canadian Jewry as a regional issue but as a "national imperative."

By the standards of other large Canadian Jewish centres, Vancouver, with the third largest Jewish population in the country and still growing rapidly, "is the most diverse and least traditional community." The intermarriage rate is high and Jewish identification is weak. "Jewish continuity here is not a challenge but a reality," says the report.

The current community infrastructure is having trouble keeping up with the growth and data indicate that without considerable investment in Jewish institutions and community buildings, an existing pattern of disaffiliation and assimilation will intensify.

The report concedes that there is a vibrancy in Vancouver Jewish life which reflects creativity, innovation and willingness to test new ideas. However, asks the report, how much of the cost of building infrastructure can be shouldered by the older, more established community? Who will pay the costs of responding to an increasingly diverse set of needs and rapidly expanding population?

The report, based on the 1991 Canadian census and prepared through the McGill Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning, asks further: What will be the impact of weakened Jewish identity in Vancouver and the high rate of intermarriage? What meaning is there in the fact that fewer Vancouver Jews identify as Jews by religion than any other Canadian community? What other kinds of association can bind Jews together outside the synagogue? How should the community respond to intermarried families which affect more than one in four Jews and almost one of every two Jewish children? What of the 4,000 persons who identify themselves as ethnic Jews but practise a religion other than Judaism.

The report suggests that priority be given to strengthening and supporting those who are most strongly identified as Jews. It is these persons "who are most likely to care about the future of the community and transmit these values to their children ... the Vancouver Jewish community will have to choose its strategy based on the reality of local life."

A few of the statistics revealed in the report show:

Community grew 130 per cent in only 24 years

- In 1991, 19,375 Jews lived in Greater Vancouver.
- Between 1981 and 1991 the Jewish population increased by 31 per cent.
- Since 1971 the community has grown by 130 per cent.
- Immigrants and interprovincial migration (mainly from Ontario) account for 48 per cent of the population growth since 1981. Almost three of 10 Jews (28 per cent) were born outside of Canada.
- Immigrants have come, since 1971, mainly from the United States (30.9 per cent) and the former Soviet Union (16.4 per cent).

The percentage of Jews who identify themselves by ethnic origin and practise no religion (25.9 per cent) is higher in Vancouver than in any other Canadian centre. Another 17.7 per cent practise another religion, the highest in the country.

- The intermarriage rate, at 26.2 per cent, has risen more quickly in the past 10 years than in any other Jewish centre in Canada.
- The percentage of children in intermarried families has reached "staggering proportions." Almost one of two children (45 per cent) lived in a family situation where one person was not Jewish.
- Intermarriage is more common among younger Jews, particularly in the 25-39 age group. Close to half (45.1 per cent of the 25-39 group) live in intermarried families. Intermarriage is more common for people born in Canada and in other Western countries than for persons born elsewhere.
- The predominant living arrangement remains husband-wife families, over 75 per cent; but 5.4 per cent lived common law, which is double the national percentage.
- Vancouver Jews and Vancouverites generally were better off economically than Canadian Jews and all Canadians. Almost three times as many Jews earned $75,000 or more in 1991 than did the Vancouver population as a whole.
- Vancouver Jewry has a greater percentage in professional and management positions than the general population. For example, 7.1 per cent of Jews were accountants, notaries, lawyers, doctors or dentists, compared with 2.2 per cent of all persons in Vancouver.
- Over half of all Jews (58.4 per cent) were either enrolled in university or had completed a bachelor's degree. These rates were twice that of Canadians and Vancouverites generally.

The report was prepared by James L. Torczyner, Shari Brotman and Jean Gerber in conjunction with the Canadian Council of Jewish Federations, the JFGV and Statistics Canada.

Montreal orphanages alumni hold their sixth reunion

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — They were like family — closer than families, some insist — more than half a century ago in Montreal in the Montefiore Orphans Home on Jeanne Mance Street and the Hebrew Orphans Home in Westmount.

Now, although they're scattered across the continent, they look forward to meeting when possible and sharing memories.

A sixth combined reunion recently brought Montefiore and Westmount alumni to the Toronto area for a weekend in North York.

The majority still live in Montreal; but several have come to Toronto and gatherings generally alternate between the two cities.

In North York, they cluster around a table covered with old snapshots Max Matt has brought, trying to identify themselves and friends from the early days. Matt, now 84, was raised at Montefiore and given a supervisory position there when he reached 16, the age when most young people had to leave. At 19, he was appointed superintendent of Westmount. He and his wife Wanda live in Bloomfield, Conn., but always try to attend reunions.

Matt poses for snapshots with his "girls" and the whole group. Behind the camera is Myer Gordon, a former Montefiore boy. Gordon and his wife Judy are very involved in organizing the reunions.

Gordon takes more pictures, one of Harry Lenetsky (Montefiore) standing proudly with his granddaughters, Lauren Rubinstein from New York and Carolyn Heft of Vancouver.

Sam Raminsky talks about the time when he was invited to try out for the Montreal Canadiens and went to Baltimore briefly but left the team to come back and marry Sylvia, whom he had met when they were both at Westmount. Sam's pace has slowed somewhat, but he is currently shuffleboard champion at his Deerfield, West Palm Beach condo.

Tina (Weisfeld) and her husband Leonard Rosen talked enthusiastically about their trip to Holland for the D-Day remembrance in June. Rosen served as a driver with the Canadian Army in Italy and Holland during World War II.

Not all the children at Montefiore and Westmount were actually orphans. Some had one parent who just couldn't cope and they were usually able to visit with that parent or other family.

It was dormitory living and multiple bar mitzvahs at the orphanages, but there was caring, sharing and responsibility. The youngsters attended neighborhood schools and received an excellent Jewish education.

They count among their numbers a San Francisco municipal court judge, a composer and a violinist who played at Covent Garden.

Montefiore closed in 1936 and Westmount in 1942.

Syrian Jewry advocate recalls her secret efforts

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Speaking at two major gifts functions here prior to the official launch on Sept. 12 of Vancouver's annual Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign, Judy Feld Carr described her 23 years of labor on behalf of the rescue of Syrian Jewry.

Referring to a July ceremony sponsored by the government of Israel she said, "In that moment of joy, on seeing reunited families living in Israel and almost miraculously starting new lives with enthusiasm, optimism but with some trepidation, I realized that 23 years of covert, frustrating and always agonzing work had, at long last, virtually come to an end."

Carr's secret efforts were responsible for freeing 3,126 Jews from Syria, according to Israeli government statistics.

In 1948, when Israel became a state, the Syrian Jewish population was about 40,000. It has shrunk to 150 now — mainly older people who find it difficult to leave their home of many years.

Without publicity or fanfare, Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation set up the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands, named in memory of Carr's late husband, who died in 1973. The campaign for funds operated strictly by word of mouth.

At first, the fund managed to send thousands of dollars worth of mezuzot, t'fillin, tallitot, chumashim, siddurim and Hebrew school books to Syria. Because there could be no public campaign for money, it was a hand-to-mouth existence for the fund and all the activities were conducted on a voluntary basis.

Carr said not a penny of United Israel Appeal or any other organizational money was used.

Rabbis in Syria were able to advise Carr of the receipt of the material through code words in cables. Many of the rabbis, she noted, had come from Spain and knew from the experience of Marranos how to communicate secretly.

This April, Israel decided the secrecy had to end and the world got to know that the Jews of Syria had been able to find haven there. This was announced at a media conference where Foreign Minister Shimon Peres "publicly acknowledged the secret work I had been involved in for so long." (The story was played on the front page of the Vancouver Sun.)

Carr paid tribute to the Jewish Agency's social workers for their efforts in helping with the absorption of the Syrians. "Obviously," she said, "our UJA dollars play an important part in this activity."

Through the quiet diplomacy of the then Canadian Jewish Congress president, Judge Sidney Harris, Carr was able to enlist the aid of Canada's Foreign Affairs Department and the embassy in Damascus went "beyond the call of duty" in helping out.

As the final chapter of the Syrian exodus closes, and with the rescue nearing completion, "we can truly say with thanks," said Carr, "Zeh Hayom Asa Adoshem Nagilla Ve-Nismacha Bo — this is the day the Lord has made; let us rejoice and be happy."

A history of the exodus is being written by Harold Troper, who co-authored None Is Too Many.

Judy Feld Carr and her namesake, Judy Hamra, daughter of Syria's former Chief Rabbi, who's now in Israel.

It is an appropriate time to reflect upon the mission that the Rebbe has entrusted to us all

The Rebbe prophecized, "The Time of Redemption Has Arrived". The era of Moshiach is upon us, an era which brings G-d's creation to completion, brings peace and holiness to all mankind, and restores the Jewish People to their sovereign home in the Land of Israel.

The Rebbe then entrusted us with the mission of "Kabolas Pnei Moshiach - Greeting Moshiach יחי אדוננו מורנו ורבינו מלך המשיח לעולם ועד

In a spirit of faith and expectation, I will commit to improve myself to better my world, in order to be ready to greet Moshiach and hasten the great hour for which we have all been waiting.

I agree to add something special in the New Year.
Some suggestions: ❑Study Torah ❑Buy Torah Books ❑Give Charity
❑Learn about Moshiach ❑ Honouring Parents ❑Treat others kindly ❑ other

Mexican choreographer to lead Israeli folkdance workshop

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Alberto Zirlinger, a noted Mexican choreographer and teacher of Israeli dance, will be coming to Winnipeg Oct. 14 and 15, to conduct an Israeli folkdance workshop at the Rosh Pina Synagogue.

"This will be an excellent opportunity for everybody from beginners to the most advanced dancers to learn some extremely exciting Israeli folkdances," says Casey Chisick, one of the artistic directors of Winnipeg's long-running Sarah Sommer Chai Folk Ensemble.

(Chai is co-sponsoring Zirlinger's visit in partnership with the Rosh Pina Israeli Folk Dance Group which is led by Shoshana Shalev Minuk.)

"Alberto is one of the finest teachers and choreographers Chai has had the privilege of working with," Chisick continues. "His workshop will feature the latest dance by such well-known choreographers as Shlomo Maman, Meyer Shem Tov and Gadi Biton. He will also be teaching brand new dances which won major prizes at the 1995 Karmiel Israeli Folk Dance Festival in Israel."

Originally from Argentina, Zirlinger, 29, has danced with several well-respected groups and served as director of the Dalia Israeli Folk Dance Festival.

Since moving to Mexico City in 1990, he has served as artistic director and chief choreographer of the groups Reguesh and Achshav U Le Tamid and he has been the artistic director of Mexico City's Festival Aviv Carlos Halpert.

He has won several awards for his work and has been a staff member at Israeli folkdance camps. He has given workshops in several Mexican cities as well as in Panama, Venezuela and New York.

The directors of Chai first became aware of his work in 1994 when they were invited as observers to the Festival Aviv. They met him last spring, when Chai was invited to perform in the festival, and discussed his coming to Winnipeg as a guest choreographer.

Chisick reports that during his stay in Winnipeg, Zirlinger will be staging a brand new suite for Chai as well as adapting another of his works, Machol Ro'im, for the group. Chai will be debuting both pieces at its annual February concert.

Jerusalem rabbi guest speaker at Bloor JCC

TORONTO — Rabbi Ben Hollander of Jerusalem is the guest speaker for a pre-Rosh Hashanah workshop co-sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and the Downtown Reform Minyan on Sept. 21 from 7 to 10 p.m. at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

Well known throughout Israel for his weekly parshah (Torah portion) broadcasts on Radio Kol Yisrael, Rabbi Hollander is a Conservative rabbi who serves as professor of rabbinics at Hebrew Union College, the Reform Rabbinical seminary in Jerusalem.

Associated for many years with Beth Tzedec Congregation, he is back in Toronto for the Holy Days.

Holocaust memoirs sought

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Holocaust survivors are invited to submit their unpublished autobiographies to a new project at Concordia University that seeks to collect, edit and preserve such written memoirs for the benefit of scholars.

Professors Kurt Jonassohn and Mervin Butovsky are looking for manuscripts that are firsthand accounts of Jews who lived through World War II in Europe. The manuscripts should be in English or French and the author still living.

The project is under the auspices of the Concordia-based Montreal Institute for Genocide Studies and is financed, at least for the first year, by a multiculturalism grant the university received from the former Conservative government for the establishment of a Jewish studies chair.

These accounts will be deposited in the Concordia library's Azrieli Collection, one of the largest — if not largest — Holocaust archives in Canada, and made available to researchers.

This is believed to be the first project of its kind in Canada.

For more information, call Butovsky at 514-848-2340; or Montreal Institute for Genocide Studies, Concordia University, 1455 de Maisonneuve Blvd. W., Montreal, Que. H3G 1M8.

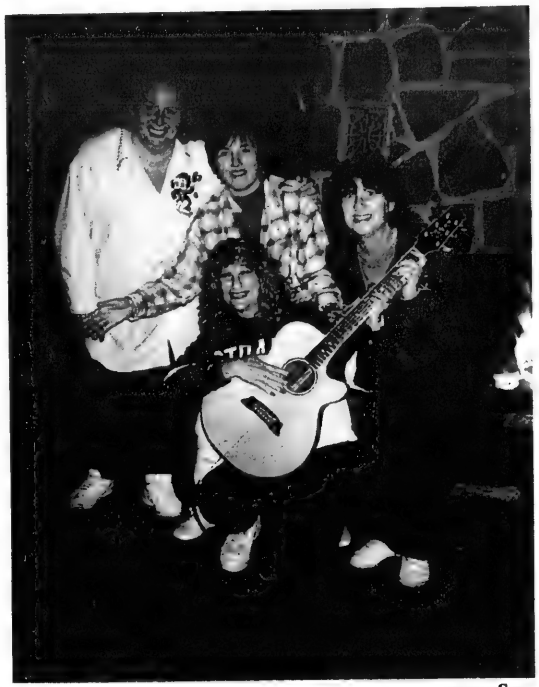
Hi-jinks reign supreme at adult summer camp

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter



The four amigos created plenty of mayhem at summer camp. Seen here (from left) are Elaine Myers, Carol Halpert and Pam Shapiro. Kneeling with the guitar is Honey 'the happy camper' Mahl.

TORONTO — It was a typical bit of summer camp silliness.

Long past midnight, after a campfire sing-along and mess-hall fressing, about 20 wild and crazy campers decided to raid the camp director's cabin. Finding his room, they entered unannounced, jumped on his bed, pulled off his sleeping bag and exposed him and his "undies" to the world.

After a slight period of disorientation, he gleefully joined along in the dancing and impromptu limbo contest, performing in nothing but his T-shirt and underwear, Honey Mahl recalls.

Mahl, one of the instigators of the post-midnight mayhem, smiles proudly as she recounts the incident. It was one of the highlights of her three-day stay at Camp Northland in Haliburton, Ont. and it was something she could proudly recount to her kids.

Mahl, like others who attended the Kids at Heart program at Camp Northland, is a "mature" camper, at least on the age side, a "40ish" woman "a little bit long on the 'ish', " she says.

Her stay at Northland was a chance to re-experience the fun of being young, carefree and (temporarily) husband- and child-free.

A self-styled "waterbaby," Mahl enjoyed the swimming, windsurfing, waterskiing and canoeing that was offered at the kosher summer camp, usually frequented by Jewish kids from Toronto.

She even enjoyed the arts and crafts activities, fashioning a Dali-esque, basket-like thingamajig, or something like it, for one of her fellow sales reps here at The CJN.

The nights were filled with campfire activities, singing and dancing. One of the other campers was an understudy for Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, and he taught other campers various song and dance routines.

Going to camp was not Mahl's idea in the first place. Growing up, she never went to camp. "I was a Crystal Beach person."

But her kids, Jill, Tammy and Melanie, felt "it was payback time for their camp experiences" and they pushed her into it. "They surprised me," Mahl said. "They paid."

Two of Mahl's friends, Elaine Myers and Pam Shapiro, had already enrolled and Mahl was determined to join them. She phoned the camp organizers and told them: "Two of my friends are in a cabin and if I can't be in the same cabin, I'll have my mother call and complain."

A third friend, Carol Halpert, signed on as well and the four amigos were assigned to "luxury" accomodations — they had their own bathroom and shower.

Many of the other campers weren't so lucky and those who came expecting something like a Muskoka lodge were disappointed. "One woman came up in a BMW and left the next day," she said.

The food was "just like camp" but seemed to get better as the week wore on. Taking no chances, the foursome brought along plenty of junk food, peach schnapps, wine and other goodies. "Don't ask," Mahl said. "We had bags and bags full. People were coming in to look."

The days were busy and Mahl has precious memories of "killing ourselves laughing" while they bobbed up and down in an inner tube in the lake.

Mahl met many people from all walks of life and there's already talk about a reunion. "You know what they say," she says. "The friends you make at camp are friends for life.

"We're going back next year for sure. We all had expectations, but it was a lot better."

Theatres collaborate on show

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As it begins its ninth season, the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT) can proudly claim its place as a recognized and integral part of Winnipeg's professional theatre scene.

Audiences have grown to nearly 5,000 per show, the shows have been critically acclaimed and generally they have done well at the box office.

The theatre's coming of age is particularly well demonstrated by the fact that, for the first time this season, the WJT is co-producing the first two shows with other mainstream professional theatre companies.

The WJT's first show Kindertransport, is a co-production with Saskatoon's Persephone Theatre where it will also appear. The Winnipeg run is scheduled for Oct. 19 to 29.

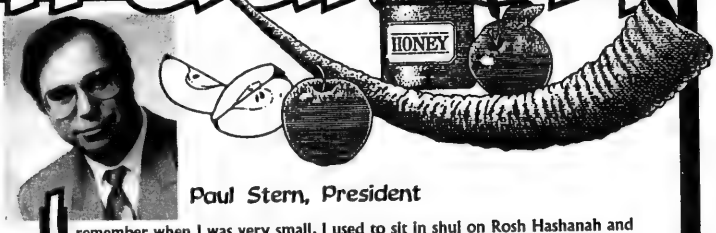
Kindersport, written by Diane Samuels, is the story of one girl's separation from her parents and her ancestry. The girl is one of the 10,000 Jewish children who were allowed into Great Britain at the outbreak of World War II. The play is set in an attic where three generations of women are seeking to find the truth.

The WJT's second production, The League of Nathans, written by Jason Sherman, is being co-produced with Winnipeg's Prairie Theatre Exchange (PTE) and run at the PTE's theatre Feb. 1 to 17. (All three WJT production this year will be staged at the PTE.)

The WJT's final production of the season will be the Canadian debut of Family Secrets, April 25 to May 5. The one woman show ran off Broadway for a record two years. Gordon reports the WJT is negotiating with a well-known actress in Toronto to star.

With the 1995-96 season set, the WJT has begun work on the 1996-97 season. Sherman has been hired to prepare the play None Is Too Many, based on the book of the same name, for production next season. The WJT has received funding from the Canada Council and the National Federation of Jewish Culture.

Tradition



Paul Stern, President

I remember when I was very small, I used to sit in shul on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippr snuggled up to my Saba. I'd listen to Kol Nidre mezmorized by the beauty of the words and the music . . .

And when it was time for the Shofar to sound, I'd close my eyes and puff out my cheeks and pretend that it was me blowing . . .

And there was nothing more delicious than my mother's chicken soup or my Aunt Clara's desserts.

After all these years, all the familiarity, I still look forward to Yom Tov with great excitement. Now I celebrate these times with my family and I know these traditions will carry on.

In this changing world hold on to the things you can rely on

Wishing you and your family a very Happy, Healthy, Prosperous New Year.
Thank you for making us one of your family traditions.

PGA pro may have to go back to school

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 47, Bruce Fleisher may be going back to school.

No, he's not going into the classroom to read classic literature by dead white males or even study voodoo economics.

Rather, it's looking increasingly likely that he'll have to go back to golf school to requalify for a coveted place on the PGA Tour.

Nineteen-ninety-five hasn't been the best of years for the ball striker from Ballen Isles, Fla., near North Palm Beach. He began the year with tendinitis in his right arm and missed most of the early-season tour events in California. Since his return, he's played average golf, though his eighth place finish at the Buick Open provided him with a handsome pay cheque.

At the Bell Canadian Open recently, Fleisher shot a one over par 289 to earn $10,790. Another Jewish golfer, Tony Sills, carded a 282 for an eighth place finish and a $43,550 payday. A third Jewish golfer, Skip Kendall, failed to make the cut.

Going into the final round, Fleisher and Sills were tied at three under par, but Fleisher shot a disappointing 76 to Sills' 69 on Glen Abbey's tough par 72 course.

So much of the game is mental and depends on confidence, Fleisher said after the third round. "It's hard to be aggressive without that self-esteem," he said.

Despite his disappointing season and relatively low earnings, Fleisher is philosophical about having to requalify. Still, he acknowledges it will be difficult at his stage of life to have to do so, though he hasn't entirely written off this year yet.

"I'm trying to stay healthy and get better, trying to win," he said.

Fleisher expects to play in 20 tour events this season and he still has a shot at boosting his earnings so he can avoid golf school.

But he acknowledges he's already looking far beyond next year to the day he turns 50 and qualifies for the senior tour. "It's nice to know there's golf after the PGA Tour," he said.

The seniors seem to have more fun at the game and the competition isn't as intense as in the PGA. In addition, most of his contemporaries have left the tour and he misses the camaraderie he experienced in earlier years, he said.

Watching him play a few holes at the treacherous, trouble-filled Glen Abbey, it's clear Fleisher has the tools to salvage this season and succeed in senior events. His swing is smooth as silk and he regularly placed his tee shot in the middle of the fairway.

Following the Bell Canadian Open, he was ranked fifth in driving accuracy with a 79.2 per cent average. He doesn't hit the ball far, but he keeps it in play. His short game and putting are also good.

That combination kept him in the money hunt at Glen Abbey, which at 7,112 yards, favors long hitters.

Fleisher said the Oakville course, designed by Jack Nicklaus, has difficult roughs and only provides small openings to the greens, putting a premium on accuracy.

He discounted suggestions the Open field was weak. Any event with golfers like Nick Price, Fred Couples and Mark O'Meara has to be considered top notch. You have to put up good numbers to win any event, whether it's in the PGA or on the Nike Tour, Fleisher said.

Fleisher credits his wife Wendy with having the understanding to put up with his long stints away from home. In 1980, her brush with death during childbirth showed him there was more to life than golf. In 1983, he withdrew from the tour to be closer to his family and for eight years served as director of golf at the Westview Country Club in West Miami and then at Williams Island in North Miami Beach.

In 1991, he launched his comeback with a bang, as he won his first tour event, the New England Classic. During the 1990s, he earned between $210,000 and $240,000 a year on the tour.

A member of Sports for Israel, a Maccabi-affiliated organization in the United States, Fleisher served as coach for the U.S. golf team at the 1989 Maccabiah Games in Israel. That's when he met Kendall, who tried out for the team.

Golf ball maven offers big savings

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With green fees, ultralight graphite-shafted clubs and other equipment thrown in, golf is an expensive enough proposition without having to lay out big bucks for balata balls every week.

That's particularly the case if you still haven't cured your stubborn slice or you hook the ball or you hit it too fat or too thin or you mis-hit it in any one of a zillion ways possible.

Odds are you've lost bagsfull of balls in the woods or water that for some inexplicable reason, course architects feel compelled to place on golf links.

Jeffrey Shuster thinks he's hit on a way for golfers to replenish their supply of Titleists and Top Flites and keep some of their money in their pockets. He's opened a business, called Good As New Golf Balls, that offers golfers second-hand balls in good condition.

They're not quite new but at prices about 50 per cent off the cost of new, who's complaining?

His Doncaster Avenue emporium in Thornhill features bins of Titleist DT 100s, HVCs, HP2s and DT90s, Top Flite XL IIs, Tours and Magnas; and balls by Ultra, Tour Edition, Molitor, MaxFli and Prostar.

In another trade, the balls might be called "gently used" and many appear to have been hit only once or twice before finding the water. (Hasn't anybody heard of "water balls?")

Shuster, 23, recovers the balls from water hazards at about 10 Metro-area courses. The golf clubs contract with Shuster who in turn hires professional divers to pay early morning visits to the courses and retrieve the balls. The divers can find as many as 1,500 balls on a good day and often come back with 1,000.

"It's a little shocking how many balls go in the water," Shuster says.

The balls are cleaned and sorted by brand and placed in large wooden bins in the store.

Since opening the business in April, Shuster estimates that he has sold more than 20,000 balls a month, with sales of 1,000 a day not unusual.

The best bargains are at the top end, Shuster says. Balata balls (balata refers to the ball's hard cover) sell for $16.79 a dozen at his shop but regularly retail for about $35 a dozen, he said.

Titleist and Ultra are the most popular brands, but "I sell a lot of everything."

Shuster said he was surprised at the popularity of "shags," the worn out, beaten-about balls that are discolored and flawed.

"I didn't think the shags would sell at all. But at one time, I had trouble keeping up with demand," he said.

Shuster believes used golf balls are a growth industry. High and low handicappers alike frequent the store and he's already considering opening a second outlet in Mississauga next spring.

"[Golf] is one of the fastest growing sports in North America," he said. "It's the kind of product people always need and there's abolutely nothing wrong with the balls recovered from the ponds. It's a multi-million dollar business in the United States."

Maccabi youth team hauls home the hardware

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Maccabi Ontario's team of 40 athletes averaged nearly a medal a piece at the recent Jewish Community Centre Maccabi Youth Games in Long Island, N.Y.

The athletes came home with a total of 36 medals, including nine gold, 21 silver and six bronze. They competed in track and field, swimming, basketball (boys and girls) and tennis.

The track team led the way with 25 medals, including five gold, and swimming pitched in with 11 medals, among them, four gold.

Harley Gold was as good as his name, earning five medals, including gold in the senior boys (15-17) 4 x 400-metre relay. He won silvers in the 100m, the 200m, the 400m and the 4 x 100m relay.

Josh Nisker won gold in the 100m hurdles for boys 13-14. He took home silvers in the 100m, the 200m and the 4 x 100 relay and bronze in the long jump.

Darryl Firsten was part of Toronto's senior boys' gold medal 4 x 400 relay team and won an individual silver in the 800m.

Jamie Firsten won silver in the boys (13-14) 100m hurdles, the 4 x 100 relay and the 300m hurdles. He earned a bronze in the high jump.

Other senior boys medalists include: Shawn Pulver, gold in the 4 x 400 relay, bronze in both 800m and 1600m; Daniel Goldenberg, gold in the 4 x 400 relay, silver in the 3200m and bronze in the 1600m; and Matt Grinstein, three silvers in boys (13-14) high jump, long jump and 4 x 100 relay.

In swimming, Jennifer Solish won gold in the girls (12-14) 4 x 25 medley relay and silver in the 4 x 100 freestyle relay; Sara Jane Salmona, gold in the 4 x 25 medley relay, silver in the 400m individual medley and silver in the 4 x 100 freestyle relay; Leah Spergel, gold in the 4 x 25 medley relay and silver in the 4 x 100 freestyle relay; Rebecca Ross, gold in the 4 x 25 medley relay and silver in the 4 x 100 freestyle relay.

Steven Jacobson won a silver medal in the boys (15-16) 200m butterfly and Marc Singer earned a bronze in the 100m breaststroke for boys 13-14.

Hot shooting sinks basketball squad

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hot shooting by their opponents and the inability to hold on to a 15-point lead cost Toronto's basketball team a bronze medal at the Maccabi Youth Games in Columbus, Ohio.

The team from Toronto was smoked in the second half, as host Columbus hit on all but one basket from the floor, going on to win 69-62. The loss left Toronto out of the medals with a 2-3 record, good for a fourth place finish in the six-team event. They had won the gold medal in Pittsburgh two years ago.

In an earlier game, the boys team dropped a backbreaking 37-34 decision to a team from Pittsburgh.

The two late losses were crushing to coach Neil Rothenberg, while the boys were more upset by the loss to Pittsburgh, he said.

Earlier, Toronto beat Louisville and Ann Arbor and then faced powerhouse Pittsburgh in a game they lost 59-37.

With a rematch looming against the Pennsylvanians in the semi-final game, Toronto altered its strategy. Rothenberg switched them from a man-to-man defence to a zone system. The plan worked. They clipped 20 points off the Pittsburgh score and had a chance to tie the game at the buzzer, but a three-pointer caromed off the rim and Pittsburg held on to win by three.

That loss seemed to take a lot of the wind out of Toronto's sails.

In the subsequent bronze medal contest, Toronto led Columbus throughout the first half but relinquished the lead in the second when Columbus shooters got hot. From there, the teams traded baskets but Columbus repeatedly sank their long shots and the American team showed "a greater will to win," Rothenberg said.

"As Canadian kids get older, they take it more seriously," he added.

Despite the disappointing basketball results, the boys showed well in a variety of track and field events.

(While the main track meet was held in Long Island, similar events were held for the basketball players in Columbus. Five regional Maccabi Games were held this summer. The Columbus basketball competition was for boys aged 12-14.)

In all, Toronto captured 23 medals in Columbus.

Tali Greenberg won a gold in shot put; Ben Martin finished first in high jump and long jump; Michael Goldfarb won gold in 1,600-yard race; Steve Rubinoff won the 3,200-yard run; and Toronto won the 4-by-400 yard relay.

The team was selected after tryouts in May, attended by 40 players. Six of the 10 chosen play at Jewish day schools, as well as in the house league at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Hebron an obstacle to negotiating breakthrough

CJN News Services

TABA — After burning the midnight oil here most of last weekend, Israel and the Palestinians concluded that, barring a miracle, they would not sign an interim agreement this week, as scheduled.

There had been hopes that Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat would achieve a last-minute breakthrough on outstanding obstacles and initial a document to be signed in Washington Sept. 21.

"I think there will be no signing on Thursday," a disappointed Peres said, shortly before Arafat left for Gaza to meet with the visiting Japanese prime minister. "I made every effort possible. We are not pressed for time."

Protecting Jewish residents

Washington had asked for confirmation of whether it should prepare for a Thursday signing ceremony. As The CJN went to press Monday morning, it was unclear what the answer was and uncertain whether talks would continue on into the week.

The White House has offered Sept. 28 or Oct. 5 as alternate dates for a formal signing ceremony.

Peres and Arafat would seem to have settled the issue of Palestinian elections, but not the thorny matter of Hebron.

"We have an agreement on water and an agreement on elections," Peres said without elaborating.

There were unconfirmed reports that Israel has agreed to something resembling a Palestinian parliament.

Palestinian officials said the Israel Defence Force (IDF) will have 100 days from the day the agreement is signed to withdraw from the areas agreed upon.

There will then be three weeks of campaigning before elections for the Palestinian self-rule council are held. The Palestinians want to hold the elections before Ramadan, which starts at the end of January.

Arafat aide Nabil Abu Rudeineh said the Palestinians want the IDF to withdraw from Hebron within the next few months. He called the new Israeli position on Hebron, tabled Saturday night, "totally unacceptable."

Israel had suggested the town of 450 Jews and 115,00 Palestinians be divided into three "control zones." One zone would be under exclusive Israeli control; the second under Palestinian civilian responsibility, with security remaining in Israeli hands. The Palestinians would take over the third zone entirely, including security.

Palestinian officials said that without a deal on Hebron, there will be no accord.

The crux of the matter is that Israel wants the IDF to have freedom of movement throughout Hebron to protect Jewish residents, while Arafat wants to demonstrate that he has visibly ended Israeli control over the city.

"There is no problem [with] the IDF staying to protect the Jewish area," one source close to the negotiations said. "The problem is the rest of the city. It is important to Arafat that he be seen as controlling Hebron."

Sharing joint patrols

That has led some to believe that a solution to Hebron would involve the IDF and the Palestinian police each having restricted authority and sharing joint patrols, alongside a multinational force similar to the one that patrolled Hebron after last year's Machpelah Cave massacre.

Sources said Israel is willing to bow to Arafat's wish that the building serving as IDF headquarters in the city be turned over to the Palestinian Authority.

It also appears that Israel is ready to have unarmed Palestinians patrol the point where Arabs enter the Machpelah Cave.

In a bid to bolster his position, Arafat invited Hebron Mayor Mustafa Natshe and other leading Hebronites to the talks to explain the importance of the city to Peres.

"There has to be drama down to the last second, so Arafat can tell his people that he has done everything possible," a source said.

Some of the other issues, however, have apparently been resolved.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erakat said it has been agreed that the Palestinian self-rule council will have 82 members. Until recently, Israel had insisted on 35 members, saying it did not want a higher number because the council would then resemble a parliament.

Erakat said Israel did not mind if the body elected a parliamentary-style speaker, while Arafat would be named head of an "executive" panel of "ministers" within the broader body. Israeli officials refused to comment.

At the same time, sources said the Palestinians have acquiesced to having a bypass road built from the Jerusalem neighborhood of Gilo to Rachel's Tomb. This road would be used only by Israelis.

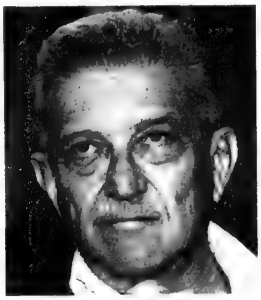
President's New Year greetings

President Ezer Weizman's Rosh Hashanah message to Jewish communities abroad, 1995-5756



Ezer Weizman

Dear Friends,

Rosh Hashanah this year coincides with Jerusalem's anniversary celebration. For over 3,000 years, Jerusalem has been the sovereign and spiritual centre of Israel and the Jewish people. Jerusalem is unique. No other city has undergone so many wars and yet remained as it was 3,000 years ago — the City of David, the City of Zion and Jerusalem. The Jewish people cannot exist without Jerusalem and it cannot exist without the Jewish people.

No other city has made such an important contribution to humanity. From here, the prophets taught social justice, direct rule, fraternity and equality among men and true peace among nations. From here, the message went to mankind that there is good, hope and redemption. It is, therefore, no wonder that other nations and faiths have turned to and yearned for Jerusalem as well.

The State of Israel is now in the middle of peace negotiations. This is a very difficult and protracted process, with many internal and painful contentions. But we are united in a united Jerusalem. Jerusalem has always been and remains the centre of yearning of Jews throughout the world.

Peace process

Over 150 countries have permanent missions to Israel. World leaders visit us regularly, as do important delegations. Our economy is very sound and our exports increase yearly. Our hi-tech industries are among the most interesting and significant in the world. At the same time, Israel has successfully absorbed half a million new immigrants. Israel is held in high esteem throughout the world and is given honor by all who have come to know it.

During the past year, we signed a peace treaty with Jordan. I hope that the peace process will continue, enabling us to sign similar treaties with our other Arab neighbors.

I know that you are troubled and seek answers to many questions, such as the meaning of Zionism today and the continuity of the Jewish people in the Diaspora. The solution is aliyah — for Jews to come and live in Petah Tikva, Rishon Lezion, Beersheva, Metulla, Yeruham, Nahariya and many other cities in Israel. Together we will overcome our problems.

You were always proud when Israel fought and won her battles. Now Israel is strong and she warrants no less your continued pride and support.

On the eve of Rosh Hashanah, I send you and your families my sincere wishes for a year of true peace, health and success.

Child support and fairness

Recent news reports suggest that the payment of child support will be regulated under Canada's Divorce Act by way of a strict schedule based on the payer's gross income and the number of children he has. Until now, the courts often used an informal formula under which the parents' respective incomes were compared, the child's costs assessed, and the payer spouse would pay his appropriate share of those costs. When the formula was applied properly, this figure would be adjusted or "grossed up", so that the payer would also pay the taxes attracted by such payments once received by the other spouse. Otherwise a $500 monthly payment would really only be as little as half that amount in many cases.

Unfortunately, such a formula was not always applied fairly enough to account for the tax consequences of the payment. Many receiving parents (usually women) rightly complain in such circumstances. Of equal importance, judges apply different factors unevenly across the country with similar facts. Indeed, the same two judges in the same building could appear to consider some of the following factors equally, but decide upon a different amount of support: the mother's income; her live-in partner/boyfriend's income and allocation of joint expenses; in many situations, the seasonal nature of the payer's employment; the basic costs of raising a child on a statistical basis in a given province; the payer's new "second" family; the wife's new "second" family; new children of such second (or sometimes third) families. In my personal experience, however, I've usually felt that when all the dust has settled — and provided that both parties were properly represented — a just amount had been decided by the Court I was before.

Once these guidelines become law, many of these factors will normally no longer be considered. All that will matter in most cases is the income of the payer spouse and the number of his children. Sometimes the chart is going to be inadequately low or high, depending upon many other factors. For instance, according to the draft support guidelines, a fellow earning $70,000 yearly with two children would pay $1696.46 per month or $848.23 per child, whether the mother had no income or earned $100,000 yearly.

All this may be more efficient and make establishing child support easier. But will it be fair?

Prime Minister Rabin's Rosh Hashanah message

Rosh Hashanah message from Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to the Jewish communities in the Diaspora 5756—1995

Dear Friends, My Brothers and Sisters, Children of the Jewish People,

From Jerusalem, the eternal capital of Israel and the Jewish people, I send you greetings of peace and wishes for a good year. Warm regards from our common home.

Rosh Hashanah marks the beginning of the Jewish New Year. At this time, Jews all over the world, whether in Cape Town or Edinburgh, Miami or Buenos Aires, Jerusalem or Afula, congregate as one people, with their families, in synagogues and at home. Together, we take stock of the past year and prepare for the new one.

Yitzhak Rabin

These days, we find ourselves in one of the most important and fateful hours of the Jewish nation. We find ourselves in the process of strengthening the future of the Jewish people and the State of Israel for generations. This is a period of internal dispute and stormy debate, but it is important that we all know, in Israel and the Diaspora, that whatever the decisions will be, there will always be Ahavat Yisrael, true love of Israel and the Jewish people. In the words of our sages, "All Israel is responsible for one another." We cannot forget for one moment that while some support the course which we are taking and other oppose it — we are all brothers, we are all Jews, and we share a common fate.

This was a year of major accomplishments: we signed a peace treaty with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, the country with which we share the longest border, with whom we fought two bitter wars and suffered thousands of casualties. Today, tens of thousands of Israeli tourists have already visited Amman and its outskirts. Tens of thousands of Jordanians have toured the streets of Israel. This is one meaning of the word "peace."

We are continuing our conciliation with the Palestinians — and it is not easy. It is impossible to erase 100 years of hostility and bloodshed with the stroke of a pen and a single handshake. It is an ongoing and often painful process. We need to break down the tremendous psychological barriers between us, to understand the other side, to realize that they do not wish only to cause us harm.

We are about to implement the second stage of the agreement with the Palestinians. There are difficulties. Two peoples desire to live on the same strip of land, and we must find ways to live in peace and security, side by side.

In our talks with the Syrians, who also control Lebanon, there have been no real breakthroughs. We hope that in the coming year we will reap the fruits of peace also with Syria. Thus, we can hope to reach comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

My brothers and sisters, I will not conceal from you the difficulties which we are facing. As you know, we also face bitter enemies who violently oppose the peace. They are fundamentalist extremists who employ terrorism in order to murder both us and the peace process. In the past year they used a new form of warfare against us: suicide bombers, living bombs who inflict numerous casualties, who cost us the precious lives of soldiers and civilians alike.

In the past year the number of violent incidents against Israelis decreased, and the PLO ceased their hostile activities against us altogether. However, as a result of the deadly acts of the suicide bombers, the number of fatalities increased. We are heartbroken at the death of every one of them, and the pain and sorrow draws us together.

We have invested heavily in manpower and protective measures, both financially and in the field. There is no way to, and no one who can, promise absolute protection against terror. Nonetheless, I say to you that we are responsible for the lives of every Israeli everywhere, and we will do everything, and make every possible effort, in order to protect them.

I want to tell you today that the buds of peace have already been a diplomatic and an economic blessing. Today there is a new openness toward us in the Arab countries, and we are on the brink of establishing diplomatic relations with several of them. The economic boycott is crumbling.

We have made great strides in the economy. Our markets have grown and our prosperity has increased. Leading business experts have heaped praise on our flourishing economy. This is almost entirely due to the peace process.

Brothers and Sisters, On Rosh Hashanah we also look to the future. We must commit ourselves to ensure the continuity of our people and our heritage. Together, we must work to strengthen Jewish identity, especially in the Diaspora, where assimilation is quietly eroding our numbers. This above all is the greatest task now facing the Jewish people.

Today, there are no obstacles to aliyah. The entire world, including the Arab world, permits aliyah, and anyone who wants to come to Israel will be welcomed here with open arms. There is no other nation in the world which absorbs immigrants as we do. We encourage aliyah. In the last few years we have absorbed 700,000 immigrants, most of them from Russia and the C.I.S. A large number of them have already purchased their own homes and most have found suitable jobs. The process of immigration is never an easy one, yet most immigrants express a high level of satisfaction. We are proud of this. This current Zionist challenge, yours and ours, is to absorb this outstanding aliyah as well as possible.

This Rosh Hashanah, 5756, is especially significant, with the celebration of the 3,000 years of Jerusalem as the capital of the Jewish people. Since the days of King David, Jerusalem has been the heart of the Jewish people and the focus of our dreams. Jerusalem will for ever remain united, under Israeli sovereignty. We look forward to welcoming you, "This year in Jerusalem."

Wishing you a Shanah tovah, Shanah shel shalom, u'Gmar hatimah tovah.

Impasse emerges over Hebron

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Hebron, the only Arab city in the West Bank with a Jewish population, has emerged as the most serious single impediment to completing an agreement on expanding Palestinian autonomy.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

The issue, along with a few others, threatens to further delay progress toward phasing in stage two of the 1993 Oslo accord.

Israel and the PLO had hoped to usher in Oslo II at a ceremony in Washington before the onset of Rosh Hashanah. But in the wake of fruitless talks between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, no one expects this to happen any time soon.

In July, Israel agreed to cede eventual control of the West Bank towns of Jenin, Nablus, Tulkarem, Qalqilya, Ramallah and Bethlehem to the Palestine National Authority (PNA). But Israel, as Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said last week, insists on "special arrangements" for Hebron, which is holy to Jews and Muslims alike.

In a bid to break the impasse, Israel proposed a partial withdrawal from Hebron, with Israeli troops remaining behind in assigned enclaves to protect the 400 Jews of Hebron and the 6,000 Jewish settlers of adjacent Kiryat Arba.

But the PNA rejected the compromise. Arafat is amenable to a gradual Israeli pullout, provided it is ultimately a full withdrawal. At this juncture, Israel in unwilling to give the PNA such an assurance, partly because of Rabin's pledge that no Jewish settlers in the territories will be forced to leave their homes in the first stage of Palestinian self-rule.

The PNA, which has launched a campaign to repopulate Hebron's old Arab quarter, also wants an Israeli statement declaring that Hebron is a Palestinian town. But the Israeli government, under intense pressure from right-wing lobbying groups, is unwilling at present to accede to this demand.

As if the situation is not tense enough, the chair of the Palestine National Council, Salim al-Zanoun, said last week that the PLO's national covenant, calling for Israel's destruction, will not be amended unless Jews leave Hebron.

Hebron triggers raw, unfiltered passions because of its place in Jewish and Arab history. It is the burial site of Abraham and Sarah.

It was the seat of David's monarchy. It is a revered Muslim centre.

Destroyed by the Romans, conquered by the Arabs, held by the Ottoman Turks and the British, Hebron was captured by the Israeli army during the Six Day War.

Jews, mainly Orthodox, began to return to Hebron shortly after Israel's victory. Hebron's venerable Jewish community was razed during an Arab pogrom in 1929.

Today, with an Arab population of 120,000, Hebron is a flashpoint of Arab-Jewish acrimony. It is a stronghold of Hamas, the Islamic fundamentalist group, and of Gush Emunim, the Jewish settlers' movement. For very different reasons, both oppose the Oslo peace process.

In recent years, inter-communal violence has erupted regularly in Hebron. Many Jews have been killed and wounded by Arab attackers. Dr. Baruch Goldstein, the Kiryat Araba fanatic, murdered 29 Palestinian worshippers in Hebron's Tomb of the Patriarchs in February 1994, touching off a wave of Palestinian suicide bombings which has yet to subside.

Hebron, however, is but only one of the unresolved issues, nearly all relating to security questions, which blocks the expansion of Palestinian autonomy and with it, the calling of Palestinian elections.

Israel and the PLO are at loggerheads over water rights and allocations, Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails, land management in rural areas, and the size and functions of an elected Palestinian council.

Last week, the PNA's religious affairs minister, Hassan Tahboub, injected another potentially explosive issue into the mix by declaring that Jews will be prohibited from praying at Jewish holy places in the West Bank after they come under Palestinian jurisdiction.

But amid the hubbub caused by his injudicious remark, Israel transferred new civil powers to the PNA in the spheres of fuel, labor, agriculture, trade and insurance.

(For most recent developments on Hebron, see story in this issue.)

Pollard to appeal citizenship ruling

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — A lawyer for Jonathan Pollard's wife said last week that Israel's denial of citizenship to the imprisoned American spy will be appealed.

Mordechai Ofri, who represents the Toronto-based Esther Zeitz-Pollard, said last week he will appeal the decision by Interior Minister Ehud Barak, who turned down a request that Pollard be made an Israeli citizen.

Barak had concluded earlier this month that a law which allows the granting of citizenship to residents of another country is not applicable in this case [CJN, Sept. 14]

Zeitz-Pollard, who secretly married the spy in jail two years ago, had petitioned the government on citizenship in the hope it would help Pollard's chances for parole later this fall.

"Our next step is the Supreme Court," Ofri said. "We will appeal and then hope the judicial system sees things differently than the Interior Ministry."

Ofri added that Pollard's supporters have gathered the signatures of 85 of the 120 members of the Knesset in support of the citizenship request.

Ofri said Barak had used a legal loophole to get around granting citizenship.

He said Israel was shirking what he described as its legal and moral responsibility in the case.

Zeitz-Pollard had based her petition on a section of Israel's 1952 Citizenship Law.

The law grants state protection to those who want to immigrate to Israel, but whose effort to do so, or whose identification with Israel, is forbidden in their countries of origin.

In the past, Israel applied the law to immigration activists and Prisoners of Zion in the former Soviet Union.

Barak did say, however, that he would be willing to meet with Zeitz-Pollard to discuss the matter.

Zeitz-Pollard said Israel's granting of citizenship to her husband would signal the Jewish state's willingness to accept responsibility for him.

But her tactic split Pollard's immediate family, who saw it as hurting Jonathan's chances for parole.

A recent spate of newspaper articles in the United States have reported that the Pollard case has been thrown into turmoil. They contained vituperative remarks about Zeitz-Pollard, who is seen in some camps as a destructive force leading Pollard astray and harming his chances for early release from his life sentence.

Some critics have labelled the Montreal-born divorcee as a sort of Svengali, holding the increasingly frustrated Pollard under her spell while she alienates his family and divides supporters.

Last week, Zeitz-Pollard did not return The CJN's telephone calls.

Arabs arrested, settlers cleared in shooting death

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A coordinated effort by Israeli security and army forces led to the weekend arrests of three Palestinians suspected of involvement in the Sept. 8 killing of a Palestinian from the West Bank town of Halhoul.

The arrests prompted President Ezer Weizman to call for apologies from those who had said the killing was carried out by Jewish extremists.

"All those who feel a need to apologize should do so," he said Sunday.

Salman Zamareh, 22, was shot dead two weeks ago in his home in Halhoul, near Hebron, by unidentified gunmen in Israeli army uniforms.

Speculation that Jewish extremists were behind the killing surfaced after Halhoul residents said some of the assailants spoke Hebrew and after two small Jewish extremist groups, Eyal and the Sword of David, each claimed responsibility for the attack.

Israeli opposition leaders accused government ministers of exploiting the crime to lash out at Jewish settlers.

The Likud opposition called on Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Environment Minister Yossi Sarid to issue a public apology.

The Yesha Council, which represents settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, said that even though two small Jewish extremist groups claimed responsibility for the attack, "this should not direct the prime minister and members of the cabinet to put a blemish on the entire settler population."

The Kiryat Arba Council, which represents settlers living near Hebron, said it was considering filing a libel suit, Israel Radio reported.

Peres said he was relieved that the killers were not Jews.

"A load has been lifted from my heart," he told Israel Radio.

Before the suspects were apprehended, Israeli officials expressed the fear that if the killers were Jewish, the Palestinian Authority would have added reason to demand an increased Palestinian security presence surrounding Hebron.

Intelligence gathered by Israeli officials, as well as a bullet extracted from Zamareh's body, pointed the investigation to Palestinians.

Zamareh's body was exhumed Sept. 14 for a post-mortem examination after investigators said they could compare the bullet in Zamareh's body with cartridges found at the scene.

The type of weapon used in the attack is not used by the Israel Defence Force or Jewish settlers, police said.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported that two of those arrested were twin brothers and that the third suspect is their cousin.

Police were searching for a fourth person also believed to have been involved in the killing.

Police suspect that the four killed Zamareh when he entered his home in the middle of a burglary attempt.

Prior to reaching Zamareh's house, the suspects ransacked other homes in Halhoul, stealing money and jewelry.

Police said the three detainees were cooperating with police and confessed to previous robberies in the Hebron area.

Japanese PM begins two-day Israel visit

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Visiting Japanese Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama told Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last Sunday that Syrian President Hafez al-Assad is disappointed with the current state of the peace process.

Assad, the Japanese leader reported, believes peace talks are at an impasse as a result of the positions taken by Israel.

However, Murayama told Rabin that Assad seems intent on continuing negotiations and is aware of the economic benefits of peace.

Murayama, who arrived from Damascus Saturday night, began a two-day visit in Israel and the Palestinian autonomous area, the first by a Japanese prime minister.

At a state dinner, Rabin described the visit as "a new page in the history of relations between the two countries.

"We value your support of the peace process, and your willingness to assist those involved in the process could be a very beneficial blessing to the entire Middle East," he said.

Japan, which gave $200 million to the Palestinian Authority over the past two years, recently agreed to provide an additional $200 million over the next two years.

"We wish to make further contributions to the Middle East peace process ... Peace and stability in this region are essential for the prosperity of the entire world," said Murayama, who later visited the Gaza Strip.

Rabin reportedly explained to the Japanese leader Israel's positions on Syria and elaborated on current negotiations with the Palestinians.

Murayama confirmed that next year, Japan will dispatch 77 soldiers to the Golan Heights as part of a UN observer force.

Murayama also asked for and received Israel's support in Japan's efforts to gain membership to the UN Security Council.

Rabin and Murayama also discussed obstacles blocking the export of Israeli agricultural products to Japan.

Protesters arrested

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Twenty-two people were arrested and some 30 injured when police broke up an illegal Zo Artzenu (This is Our Land) demonstration in the centre of Jerusalem last Wednesday night.

Twenty of the injured, including six policemen, were taken to local hospitals for treatment.

Among those arrested were Zo Artzenu heads Shmuel Sackett and Moshe Feiglin who, with his hands tied above his head to illustrate passivity, encouraged people to block streets.

A crowd estimated at several thousand took part in the five-hour protest against territorial concessions.

The protest began when dozens of people gathered around the corner from the Prime Minister's residence. They were met by hundreds of police, riot police and border policemen who filled the square and several side streets.

In a show of support timed for 5:30 p.m., dozens of cars passing the intersection honked their horns, as did drivers on roads throughout the country. People on the streets began banging pans and whistling.

Shul drops Bonds pitch

By A. ENGLER ANDERSON
The Jewish Exponent

CHERRY HILL, N.J. — For the first time in its history, a 300-family synagogue here has cancelled its High Holy Day appeal for State of Israel Bonds.

The move is a protest to what congregation officials say is brutality by Israeli police toward protesters opposed to trading land for peace.

Sons of Israel, an Orthodox congregation that has made a Bonds appeal for more than 30 years, cancelled its Yom Kippur drive last week by a 30-2 vote of its board of directors.

One official estimates that the annual appeal sells between $50,000 and $60,000 worth of Israel Bonds.

"The basic purpose of the motion is to express our great unhappiness and disappointment with the treatment the Rabin government is meting out to Jews who disagree," said Rabbi Benjamin Sharfman, a synagogue board member who was one of the prime movers behind the resolution.

Bonds spokesperson Raphael Rothstein expressed regret at the action.

"We're sorry because we think it's hurting all the people in Israel. Bonds is not at all political; it is apolitical," he said.

Rothstein said some 500 Orthodox synagogues across the country have appeals scheduled.

"We have Orthodox rabbis who are enthusiastic, including the [Ashkenazi] Chief Rabbi of Israel." He was referring to Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, who issued a general statement in support of Bonds.

At Sons of Israel, congregational leaders, citing news reports they have seen in the Brooklyn-based Jewish Press newspaper and on the Internet, and stories they have heard from relatives in Israel, charge the Labor government with brutality toward peaceful protesters.

Germany returns seized land to Jewish community

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — The German government has formally returned four pieces of property in Berlin to the city's Jewish community.

"This is yet another step toward the consolidation of Jewish life in this city," said Jerzy Kanal, head of Berlin's 10,000-strong Jewish community.

Kanal received the deeds to the four pieces of property from Berlin Finance Senator Elmar Pieroth during a ceremony earlier this month at Berlin's gold-domed New Synagogue.

The New Synagogue, whose restoration was completed in time for the May 7 ceremonies marking the 50th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany, sits on one of the parcels of land returned to the Jewish community.

More urgent cases

All the returned land parcels are located in the Jewish section of Berlin.

Kanal said the Jewish community had not pressed for the return of the property sooner because it was aware that other more urgent cases involving formerly Jewish property were before the real estate authorities.

Sorting out property owned by Jews who used to live in Berlin but fled the Nazis in the 1930s has been a difficult and complicated task, said Berlin authorities, who rejected criticism that they have worked too slowly on returning Jewish real estate to its rightful owners.

They note that there are 33,249 petitions with the German government claiming Berlin property that was confiscated during the Third Reich.

By the end of July, authorities had completed work on 6,460 of the petitions, they said. Of those, 1,000 property owners or their heirs had had their real estate returned.

Most disputed district

Alexander Schnurbusch, director of the office that is handling the property-return claims, said typically, there are five claims for every piece of property in Berlin's Jewish district, which is the most disputed part of town.

He noted that there are many problems in returning property to its rightful Jewish owners.

Many original owners are dead and their heirs are often located all over the world, Schnurbusch said.

He also noted that after the Communist takeover of East Germany after the war, many land parcels were redrawn so that a piece of property owned by a Jewish resident in the 1930s may have been subdivided into other parcels.

Swiss banks uncover millions in lost accounts

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Swiss bankers released details last Tuesday in Bern of their plan to return accounts of Holocaust victims to their rightful heirs.

The announcement came as world Jewish leaders held a conference at the European Parliament in Brussels to discuss issues on the agenda of European Jewry, specifically questions of restitution.

"We are seeking to write the closing chapter on the tragic history of the Holocaust," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

The European Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization co-sponsored the meeting at the European Parliament, the legislative arm of the European Union. Parliament leaders also were to attend the conference.

Jewish officials were scheduled to meet Thursday with the Swiss Bankers Association "to begin deliberations on the necessary next steps" to return funds held in Swiss accounts, Steinberg said in an interview.

At a news conference, Swiss bankers said they have found tens of millions of dollars in their vaults that could be from secret accounts of Jews killed in the Holocaust.

In a survey of a dozen banks this year, 893 pre-1945 accounts that belonged to Holocaust victims may have been found, the bankers association said.

The bankers association reportedly added that the accounts, which need further investigation, are worth $34 million, after the addition of interest and reductions for fees and taxes.

Others have estimated higher totals, peaking at nearly $7 billion.

The Swiss banks' premium on privacy and the difficulty of producing proof of ownership of an account that once belonged to a Holocaust victim have made it difficult for descendants to identify or claim assets.

Other steps taken by the bankers association include establishing an office under the independent Swiss banking ombudsman to assist with searches and preventing banks from invoking Switzerland's 10-year statute of limitations on dormant accounts.

First Holocaust centre opens in Poland

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WARSAW — The first centre for Holocaust survivors has opened in Poland.

The facility, known as "Our Home," opened here with a ceremony last Monday that included the traditional affixing of a mezuzah on the entrance.

The centre "was created in order to meet the special needs of Jewish survivors who still reside in Poland," said Rabbi Michael Schudrich, who represents the New York-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation in Poland, which works to revitalize Eastern European Jewish communities.

"For 45 years, there was no significant opportunity for the children of survivors to learn about their Jewish heritage and to have their special emotional and psychological needs met.

"Our Home was established in order — belatedly — to meet these needs," Rabbi Schudrich added.

He estimated that there are 15,000 to 20,000 survivors and children of survivors in Poland who are interested in their Jewishness.

Mandy's Manilow rides hits to sold out concert

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For a singer who claims to have a lousy voice, Barry Manilow has gone far in his career.

He has sold 60 million albums, and based on Radio & Records industry charts Manilow is the undisputed number 1 adult contemporary performer of all time.

On his way to 25 consecutive Top 40 hits (from Mandy to I Made It Through The Rain, Manilow has earned multiple awards: a Grammy (for Copacabana in 1979), an Emmy (for his ABC TV special in 1977), a Tony (for his Broadway concert in 1977) and an Oscar nomination (for his song Ready To Take A Chance Again) in 1978.

His recent performance in Toronto at the Molson Amphitheatre was sold out, with Manilow singing music of the past. He combined his 25 hit tunes with a tribute to the songs of the 1940s, to coincide with his latest record Singing With The Big Bands.

"Love songs will stay here forever. I always hated trendy music. I always wanted to create music that will outlive me. There really are not great songs that are on commercial radio today. So I find that I have to return to my roots to produce great music," said Manilow, 49, prior to his Toronto concert.

Manilow was born in Brooklyn as Barry Alan Pincus. His parents (a Jewish mother, Edna Manilow, and a part-Irish father, Harold Keliher) were divorced when he was two. Pincus was his paternal grandmother's maiden name.

Manilow was raised by his mother and grandparents, Esther and Joseph Manilow, immigrants from Russia, in a tenement apartment in Williamsburg, a Jewish section of Brooklyn.

"We were very poor but I never knew it," he says. "I was given a secure upbringing and I always felt loved and wanted. Gramma and Grandpa taught me Jewish traditions and raised me to be polite, caring and sensitive, a gentleman," wrote Manilow in his best-selling 1987 autobiography Sweet Life: Adventures on the Way to Paradise.

Barry started singing in public while preparing for his bar mitzvah, a few weeks after changing his name to Manilow. "My name, Barry Pincus, had bothered my mother. There was no Pincus in our family. She had gone back to being called Manilow when she divorced my father. Grandpa was the last Manilow male, so if he were to die, so would the name. With my approval, a few weeks before I was to enter manhood, I had my name changed to Barry Manilow," he wrote.

The big break in Manilow's career came when he landed a job as musical arranger, director and conductor for Bette Midler and, in 1973, caught the eye of Clive Davis, president of Aristo Records.

"There was always that fight in the beginning of my career between what I thought was a commercial song and what Clive wanted," said Manilow. "But Clive was right. I am grateful to him."

Still, when success first hit, Manilow acted like a spoiled child. "I was a brat," he admitted in Sweet Life. "I came to hate fans — thinking they were out to hurt me and use me."

In 1981, friend and comedian Roberto Kent convinced Manilow to start a worldwide network of fan clubs, including one in Israel.

Although Manilow has never performed in Israel, he has sung at a number of benefits for the Jewish state.

Barry Manilow: Undisputed top adult contemporary performer.

Variety Players make Mayor Mel proud

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a case of love at first sight for North York Mayor Mel Lastman and the Mel Lastman Variety Players who put on three standing room only shows for 750 people at the North York Seniors Centre on Hendon Avenue recently.

"I heard you were good, but they were wrong, you're great," enthused Lastman after seeing the 23-member troupe, directed by Jerry Simmons, do an upbeat program of old time song and dance numbers. "I'm proud to have you bear my name."

It didn't take long for co-producer Irving Davis to remind the mayor publicly that the Seniors Centre needs larger quarters. "That's the story of my life,' Lastman replied. "Come and see me, we'll talk."

The mayor usually spends Sunday with his family and five grandchildren, but made an exception to see the show. "I can't carry a tune myself, but at Central High School of Commerce and Ryerson Public School I helped organize and promote student shows."

One of the cast, 82-year-old Kitty Cohen, did some fancy tap dancing and baton twirling in a program which included three men in drag, under the title of The Can't Do Sisters, who won a Miss Miskeit contest.

The talented cast included Ben Blane, Ruth and Sam Borovich, Dolly Brown, Hym Cohen, Helen Davis, Mussy Eisner, Ruth Flicht, Marion Green, Shirley Leaf, Roz and Arthur Livingstone, Mary Pfister, Helen Rumanek, Fia Rusten, Miriam Schott, Ron Smith, Kaye Weingarten and Kate and Morrie Ziman. Nathan Rosen and Mildred and Harold Freelick were accompanists.

Loons, no moose, on Algonquin Park canoe trek

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

JOE LAKE — The mist on the lake was lifting and the water was as smooth as glass. The plaintive call of a loon pierced the stillness of the immense evergreen forest. As I emerged from the dewy tent, the sun broke through the clouds.

Morning was dawning in Algonquin Provincial Park and all seemed well with the world.

My two companions and I, having spent our first night sleeping under a partially starry sky, prepared for our second day in Algonquin, the crown jewel of Ontario's park system.

We had come here for three days to take advantage of Algonquin's canoe routes and to unwind in a pristine wilderness relatively far from the cacophony of Toronto.

Like all visitors, we began in the busy portage store on Canoe Lake, confirming our reservations, receiving our required camping permit and renting equipment (a light-weight aluminum canoe and lifejackets).

After unloading the gear into the bobbing vessel, we set off, paddling against a stiff headwind. We passed the odd rustic cottage, though many were obscured by firs and underbrush, and the occasional children's summer camp, now empty with the end of the season.

In mid-afternoon, we selected a camp-site on Joe Lake, pitching tents, blowing up air mattresses and unrolling sleeping bags. Afterward, we dozed in the sun, trying to catch up on lost sleep.

With dusk approaching, we lit the Coleman gas burner to cook our dinner, since a fire ban had been necessitated by dry weather.

The highlight of the trip was the passage from Joe Lake to Tom Thomson Lake via the quiet of a crystalline creek filled with lily pads and swaying grass.

Sometimes we stopped rowing, letting the canoe drift as we admired the vistas: the towering pines, the granite rock walls, the wildflowers, the decaying logs poking out of the water, the world-unto-themselves islets. We scanned the bogs for moose, but to our regret saw nothing.

We pitched camp on a deserted hilly islet in the middle of Tom Thomson Lake, and after lunch, we went for a swim in the pleasantly cool waters.

As daylight fell, one of my companions ushered in the Sabbath with a prayer and a candle-lighting ceremony. It was a touching moment.

Our idyll was shattered when a park ranger appeared to inform us that camping was forbidden on this islet. But due to the lateness of the hour, he permitted us to remain until morning. I guess we were grateful.

The last day was gray and gloomy, but the rain clouds didn't dampen our mood as we headed back to Canoe Lake.

Algonquin had not disappointed.

Concert to celebrate Jerusalem 3000

The Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue Music Appreciation Committee is planning a gala concert at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York in the George Weston Recital Hall on Wednesday, Nov. 8 at 8p.m.

With the Ne'imot Singers, the committee is celebrating Jerusalem 3000 with headliner Mike Burstyn. Burstyn is a renowned entertainer who has performed on Broadway, on Israeli TV and has acted in movies.

The committee endeavours to provide musical programs to further the appreciation of Jewish music in the community and to raise funds to maintain the Cantor Louis Danto Endowment Fund, established in 1993, which provides music scholarships and supports Jewish music.

Tickets for the concert are priced from $18 to $25 and are on sale at the Centre box office or you can call the synagogue office at 633-3838.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers can forward any questions to The CJN.

By LISA GALET
Special to The CJN

The interview is one of the most stressful parts of finding a job. Role playing a real interview is an excellent way of reducing tension and preparing for the interview. Practise with a friend if you can.

The interview is your moment to shine. The interviewer has already been told that you are one of a select group of candidates. Sometimes the interviewer has seen your resume. If you are lucky, the interviewer is someone you have already spoken with over the phone.

Dressing for an interview is important. Ladies prefer skirts or dresses with nylons and low heels. Men should almost always wear a tie and dress pants if not a suit. Wear dress socks with your dress shoes. Erring on the side of conservative is preferable, but have a friend look you over before you leave to make sure you are stylish, not dowdy. If you are not sure what to wear, ask the person who arranges your interview if there is a certain way you should dress. Be aware that in today's highly stressed times, many companies have instituted more casual dress codes.

Know how to get to the interview location so that you arrive 10 to 15 minutes early. Before you even walk into the section of the building where you need to be, check your hair, makeup, balanced glasses, matching earrings, matching shoes and straighten your tie. Then greet the receptionist. Take off your coat. Don't take coffee or other offered foods because if you are already nervous there is a good chance you'll spill something.

When your interviewer meets you, remember the crucial part of the interview is the first two minutes. Say hello and smile. If you walk with your back fairly straight, look the interviewer in the eye, shake a hand that is offered, present a neat, clean and fairly stylish appearance, then sit down in the appointed place without dropping your coat or your briefcase, you have already passed many tests. Well-manicured hands and polished shoes also make a good impression.

Make yourself comfortable in your chair. Smile at your interviewer. It is okay to admit you are nervous. It is likely that your interviewer is nervous too. After all, that person has to make the decision on whether or not to hire you!

Listen to the questions you are asked and talk about your professional self. In other words, when you are asked "tell me about yourself," identify yourself by the tasks you do well or really enjoy. Add a few characteristics about the type of worker you are. These may include such strengths as punctuality or being easy to get along with, detail oriented and hardworking. Information about marital status, immigration or where your children go to school are totally irrelevant.

If you are asked a question you don't hear, say so. If you don't understand, ask for an explanation. You will be respected for your desire to please. If you are asked a question you think is too personal and perhaps illegal, you can ask your interviewer how he thinks this question may affect your work.

Once your interview is over, send a thank you note. There is nothing wrong with calling a week or so later for a decision, if you have not yet heard. This is just looking out for your own best interests.

Kibbutz Debt Arrangement Approved

JERUSALEM — The Knesset finance committee approved the kibbutz debt arrangement, but at last week's press time, the matter was subject to a re-vote.

The committee debate was loud and stormy. Six MKs from the coalition supported the arrangement while five opposition members voted against it.

S. African Delegation Arrives

JERUSALEM — A delegation of 20 South African business executives met with Israeli counterparts last week.

Export Institute general director Amir Hayck said the purpose of the meeting was twofold: to familiarize the delegation with Israel's economic and industrial potential and to try and rebuild ties between the two countries.

The delegation is South Africa's first since the election of President Nelson Mandela last year. Exports to South Africa were $89 million in 1994, while imports were $175 million.

El Al Expects $10 Million Profits

JERUSALEM — Although El Al lost some $19 million during the first half of this year, it will end the year with a profit, according to Rafi Harlev, the airline's director-general.

Harlev predicted the airline's profit would be the same as or greater than the $10 million it made last year.

Future Bakery

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Borys Wkzesnewsky's mother was horrified when he turned down a scholarship for graduate school to take over the Future Bakery, a wholesale company founded by his grandparents in 1952.

"My mother's nightmare was that I would be working beside the ovens for the rest of my life," Wkzesnewsky said. But he didn't see the point of getting a masters in business administration because, he said, he learned more about business and entrepreneurship from his grandmother than he did getting a degree in commerce.

Wkzesnewsky said running the bakery appealed to him because he saw the marketing potential of its unique breads — like the European rye made from a 43-year-old sour culture — hand-made from old European recipes by two master bakers trained by his late grandfather.

"It [the bakery] was like an unpolished gem," Wkzesnewsky said.

His appraisal of the bakery's potential worth was accurate. Since he took over the business 12 years ago, he has established four bakery cafes and a retail outlet at the St. Lawrence Market. The wholesale plant on Queen Street West has expanded into four adjoining buildings.

Wkzesnewsky also acquired M-C Dairy, a small family-run east-European-style dairy, because Future Bakery uses M-C's pressed cottage cheese, cream cheese, yogurt and sour cream, he said.

With the exception of its St. Lawrence market location, the Future Bakery owns all the properties it occupies, including a 40,000-square-foot building in Etobicoke, where the wholesale operations will be moved.

Wkzesnewsky has popularized many east European foods like borscht, perogies, blyne (blintzes), latkeh (latkahs) and kasha — the fare he serves at the Future Bakery cafes located on Queen Street West, in Bloor West Village, in the Annex and at Yonge and St. Clair. He said he doesn't sell greasy foods like French fries because he prefers to serve more nutritious foods like kasha and hearty soups.

When he took over the bakery, his first task was to learn every aspect of the business, from baking the bread to repairing the old equipment.

He still enjoys baking bread and he develops all the new recipes. The Future bakery now produces 28 different types of bread, of which 15 are rye.

Sales increased significantly after Wkzesnewsky introduced the bread into mainstream restaurants, he said.

He started the first bakery cafe 7½ years ago to fill a void in the Queen and Bathurst area — the Future Bakery has been located there for the last 41 years — because there weren't any restaurants in the area serving nutritious food.

He said at the end of a long day — he worked 16 to 20 hours a day — he couldn't get a decent meal. So he opened a neighborhood cafe that offered home cooking at reasonable prices.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

People of the Book: As we prepare to turn the page on the year 5755, some well-known literary Canadians discuss their current reading.

Howard Engel, inventor of the popular Jewish detective Benny Cooperman, is reading Julian Symon's biography of Edgar Allen Poe as well as Lord Hamlet's Castle by Hunter Steele, "a very lighthearted thriller with dialogue, mostly by Shakespeare.

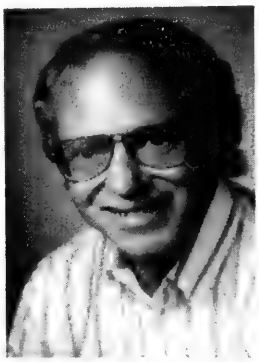
He's also sampling the late 18th-century plays of John Burgoyne ("He's the fellow who surrendered the British sword at Lexington to General Washington"). And he's re-reading Oliver Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer — "one of the most delightful plays that's ever been written, so bright and fresh every time I read it."

Engel's Hangmen and Executioners (Key-Porter, nonfiction) is due out next spring.

* * *

Southern Ontario physician-writer-poet Shel Krakofsky is reading Henry James: A Life by Leon Edel, and the recent American bestseller How We Die, by Sherwin B. Nuland, a surgeon. "It's a poetic and realistic look at death: exactly what happens," Krakofsky says. "A poetic textbook of medicine, if you will."

Blind Messiah, a book of Krakofsky's poems, is due in January (Moonstone).



See examples of Krakofsky's work on page 14 and page B-59.

Stendhal's The Red and the Black and D. H. Lawrence's The Plumed Serpent are among the titles currently stacked on the night-table of Montreal's poet Irving Layton. "I touch home with Lawrence — he's a great inspiring force. I get more substantial nourishment from him than from most other novelists."

He's also re-reading the ancient Jewish historian Josephus — "a very fine writer, very honest and profound" — as well as the ancient Latin poet Catullus, whom he extols for his wit and sophistication.

"He has something to say about life and mankind ... He's a pagan, and he doesn't have the neurotic hangups that modern writers have. Pagan writers are more straightforward about the impulses that drive human behavior."

Toronto publisher Malcolm Lester is reading In The Jaws of the Black Dogs, by John Bentley Mays, which he describes as "a very powerful and thoughtful memoir of his depression." He's also engaged in The First Man, by Albert Camus, which was recently published, some 35 years after the author's death. "Camus is a very important writer in my life, and his novel The Plague is one of my favorite books."

* * *

Elaine Newton, humanities professor at York University and literary lecturer, is currently reading two contemporary novels that she calls "enormously important to the contemporary corpus." They are Independence Day by Richard Ford, and Therapy by David Lodge. "Both are warm and wise and funny and they get at the human condition very well."

She's also re-reading Carol Shield's Pulitzer-prize-winning The Stone Diaries ("everybody's idea of what they should be reading now") as well as the Bible (Jewish Publication Society translation) for a lecture she's preparing to give soon at the Holy Blossom Temple.

Citizens: A Chronicle of the French Revolution, by Simon Schama (1989) has been occupying Toronto writer Erna Paris. "It's an interesting, anecdotal and closely-researched account of the decades leading up to the French Revolution and the Terror. He's looking at the social causes as well as the usual politic motives.

Paris' latest, The End of Days. A Story of Tolerance, Tyranny and the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain (Lester), is due for an October release.

Toronto literary agent Beverley Slopen has been turning the pages of Robert Fulford's Accidental Cry: The Transformation of Toronto, released this month by Macfarlane Walter & Ross; she handled the book professionally.

"It's a marvellous book that traces the development of Toronto from a rather dour city to the vibrant place it is now," says Slopen. "Fulford sees the opening of the new City Hall as marking the beginning of the blossoming of the modern city."

* * *

"I am large, I contain multitudes," wrote Walt Whitman, and mightn't the same be said for the nation of Israel as a whole?

Eye on Arts extends best wishes for the coming High Holy Days to all readers. May all of us be inscribed in the Book of Life for 5756.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Roll Over, Marco Polo: Twelve centuries ago, during Europe's Dark Ages, the world was divided into three large empires. United by Charlemagne, Central Europe was dominated by the Christian Carolingians, who expressed obedience to the Pope. The Mediterranean, meanwhile, was a Mohammedan lake, the Islamic crescent encompassing parts of Spain and France, Morocco, Algiers, Egypt and Palestine, and reaching eastward through Syria, Babylonia, Persia and the Sind region of India. The third empire, situated between Persia and the Pacific, was China of the T'ang dynasty.

Smaller realms included Slavonia, an unchristianized territory east of the Elba River, and Khazaria, an independent Jewish kingdom in the Crimea. To the north were the fur-producing steppes of Russia, to the south the nearly impenetrable continent of Africa.

Having conquered the Mediterranean basin by sword, the Mohammedans continued to proffer their swords in its defence. No Christians could safely travel in Islamic lands. Likewise, no Muslim was safe in Christian Europe, where a Papal bull forbade any intercourse with the "infidel."

East and West were thoroughly divided against each other and only one party — the Jew — was tolerated in all spheres. Only the Jew could travel with impunity from Christian to Muslim lands, or vice versa, and through Khazaria.

At that time, a group of Jewish merchant travellers, the Radanites, took full advantage of the opportunity that geopolitics had handed them. The Radanites — the name might have come from the Persian rah dan, meaning "knowing the way" — established at least four different trade routes over which they carried Russian furs, Damascene swords, "heathen" slaves from Slavonia and other commodities eastward, to be sold in markets from Baghdad to Canton, Jeddah to Kai-Feng. On the return journey, they brought back silks and spices, which proved to be almost worth their weight in gold. Theirs was a highly lucrative commercial monopoly.

As it had been for eight centuries, the Jewish dispersion was still centred in Babylonia, although wandering tribal bands had already settled as far west as Spain and France and as far east as China, India and Tibet. Utilizing the Persians' famed Khorasan Road to China, the Radanites stopped at Jewish settlements in the Islamic world and points east. They ate with their brethren, worshipped in their synagogues and enriched them as they passed. Since they dealt largely with their fellow Jews, they overcame language barriers by using Hebrew as a common language. Their business practice was based upon an early system of commercial credit. Disputes were resolved through the supra-national authority of halachic law.

Jewish caravans stopped at places like Hamadan, where Mordechai and Esther of the Purim story had supposedly been buried, and at Sura and Pembedita, the "Oxford and Cambridge" of medieval Jewish learning. Along with their trade goods, they often carried the responsa of the ge'onim (the rabbis). Delivering these important letters sometimes took years.

According to Prof. Louis Rabinowitz, whose brilliant and fascinating 1948 book Jewish Merchant Adventurers: A Study of the Radanites is the definitive work on the subject, numerous charters of rights and privileges were granted to European Jews in the Carolingian era, mainly because of their indispensability in international trade.

He writes: "Taking advantage of the extension of the Empire and their freedom to reside wherever they desired, they [the Jews] spread eastward from the Rhine valley across Germany, Bohemia and Poland."

Several factors were responsible for the collapse of the Radanites' lucrative monopoly in East-West trade. A wave of xenophobia in China led to the massacre of 120,000 foreign businessmen, including Jews, in 845 CE. Venice and Bari, two Italian cities which became important centres of international trade, sought to exclude Jewish shipping traffic. Waves of crusaders, who slaughtered Jews as they tramped to Jerusalem, finally broke open the East for all in the Christian world.

Sketchy though it may be, our knowledge of the Radanites has forced us to revise our conceptions of the medieval Jew.

"The picture of the European Jew of the ninth and 10th century as an 'old clothes man' and a pedlar is as absurd as it is baseless," writes Rabinowitz.

He says it was the wealth accumulated by the Radanites that later enabled other Jews to become the bankers of Europe.

Though they indulged in a slave trade that Christians and Muslims equally accepted as a legitimate commercial enterprise, the Radanites evidently exerted a positive force in the medieval world. Noting that they likely carried Arabic numerals to the West from India, Rabinowitz argues that they "brought ideas as well as goods, books as well as spices" and helped to "convey the fruit of Arab culture to the Christian world for the profit of mankind as a whole."

Future bright for bakery/cafe

"It took 14 months to buy the building next door [to the bakery]. I took a mortgage out on everything. We were busy the moment we opened the door. Boy did I learn to make sandwiches quickly."

The newest feather in his cap is the Future Bakery Grand Cafe at St. Clair and Yonge, a modern three-level 5,000-square-foot cafe, which seats 240 plus 200 more outdoors in the summer.

The hearty east European fare, sandwiches, salads and pastries are served with a variety of specialty coffees. Like all the Future Bakery cafe, it has a full bakery on the premises.

Wkzesnewsky said he wants his customers — families with young children are welcome — to feel comfortable at the cafe, whether they have a meal or a coffee.

"It's not a restaurant," he said. "Nobody is hovering over you getting you to buy more. That's not what a cafe is about. People like to interact in a non-pressure environment."

The Name Says It All — It's Who He Is — It's All He Does

You're looking at thirteen Beautiful Reasons why you should call Harrington Gardens Home

. . . By comparison the Townhouses of Harrington Gardens offer more value . . . more opulent finishings, and more of everything you've ever wanted out of living at remarkably lower costs to maintain.

Only thirteen unsurpassed enclosed Freehold Townhomes await thirteen astute buyers. Some very special 4239 sq. ft. three storey townhomes. Featuring paver block driveways . . . private double tandem garages . . . high ceilings and sun-filled skylit staircases.

Word will get around. This really is a limited opportunity of a lifetime. Don't be disappointed.

Dear Ella,

It seems that whenever I go to a shivah house there is always lots of food, but I feel this is for those sitting shivah and not for the visitors paying their respects. Yet everyone goes for the food and the atmosphere is almost like a big party. I find this disrespectful as I feel we should be visiting with those sitting shivah and talking about the person who recently passed away.

Is the food frenzy commonplace? Should I hint to those going to the "free meal" (as it seems) that perhaps they should leave the food for those sitting shivah?

Thanks for your help.

Shivah Shambles

Dear Shivah Shambles,

Traditionally when returning from a funeral, the community's first act for the mourners is to provide a meal of consolation seudat havra'ah. Often, this meal becomes large enough to feed not only the mourners but also many of the people who return to the shivah house. So now you have the ingredients for a party – people coming together in one small area with food. This may resemble a "party," but if you listen to the conversations around the room they will often be about the funeral, the deceased or the mourners.

It has also become customary for people to provide meals for the mourners. Three meals a day (and they usually send a little extra) adds up to a lot of food, not to mention the people coming in with cakes. It is not appropriate to take food out of the house during shivah; therefore, if it isn't eaten, it goes bad. That is not appropriate either. Cakes get left out on the table. People coming from work or for a minyan are hungry and voila, they are eating. The mourners may not be concerned with serving; however, there is usually a well-meaning relative or friend there who takes over.

Different shivah houses have different tones. Take your cue from the mourners. Don't feel disturbed because people are eating. You are there to comfort a friend or relative and pay your respects. Don't get caught up in what other people are doing. Although it may seem to you that the crowd is there for a "free meal," that is usually not the case. Food or no food, it is never pleasant having to go to a funeral or shivah, but it is a very important mitzvah.

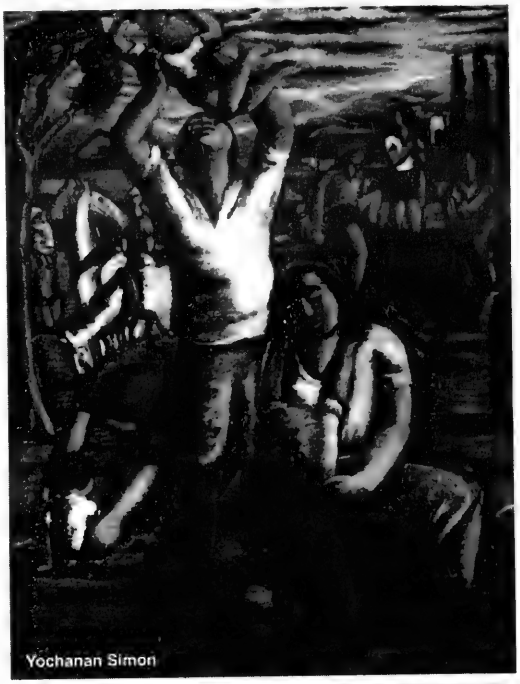
The Jewish Concept of Community

At this time of year, naturally enough, we tend to focus inward, looking back onto the paths we have taken and peering forward to the paths that may yet lie ahead. But unless we live solitary lives high atop a mountain or deep within an unexplored pocket of a forest, our paths must inevitably cross with the paths of our fellow human beings. Most of us do not live alone. Most of us live in and with a community. But what does "community" mean?

In this supplement to our Rosh Hashanah issue, we explore a number of aspects of the Jewish concept of community. We have assembled 13 articles, written by scholars and experts who each expounds on a different perspective of community.

A good starting point, however, to understanding the Jewish concept of community is, as ever, the teachings of our sages. The daily morning prayers begin with a succinct social formula advocated by the rabbis more than 2,000 years ago.

"These are the practices whose fruits one enjoys in this world, but whose essence remains intact for the world to come. They are: to honor one's father and mother, to act kindly, to attend early at a house of study in the morning and at night, to be hospitable to guests, to visit the sick, to provide the means for a woman to marry, to accompany the dead to their burial, to be focused in prayer and to bring peace between others. But the study of Torah is equal to them all."



Yochanan Simon

The behaviors enunciated above confer an immediate benefit upon another human being. They are not theoretical musings about how good things could be. True to rabbinic form, they are particular and practical directives of the things that must be, if we are to live in a good society. They are also a poignant description of the needs of all human beings around which institutions have arisen and societies have been built.

At this time of year, we reflect on the paths we have taken and the paths which may yet lie ahead. We should also reflect on how much we, each one of us, has contributed to make the society we live in a good one.

The study of Torah is equal to all the practices because, after all, such study should lead inexorably to these good behaviors. It is a mentshlich cycle.

Choosing what's important

So here we are again. The lazy days of summer have already begun to recede into the dim recesses of our minds.

Not that summer really has many lazy days for those of us grappling with children, jobs, housework, lawn work and multitudinous errands, but the sunshine and warm weather make those never-ending duties much less tedious. Or so people say.

Now that Labor Day is over, the kids have gone back to school, eager to savor the gems of learning that their inspired teachers will impart.

Or so people say. Actually, any kid who expresses that attitude, I suspect, is either bucking for a large allowance increase or seeking a later curfew. They probably also tell you that they like your music or your taste in clothes.

Why is it that myth-makers keep pumping out these feel-good notions, instead of focusing on the reality of steamy traffic jams, kids threatening to join the Foreign Legion rather than face that math teacher who everyone knows makes Atilla the Hun look like a pussycat, and upcoming snow storms, which, considering the lateness of the holy days this year just may join us in our sukkah.

Which might be better than the guests at one of the first Sukkot holidays in the then-nascent Jewish community of Thornhill.

Spying a huge field of bulrushes, a persuasive householder convinced a group of artistic-minded husbands that this foliage would make ideal coverings for their sukkah.

A contingent of men with machetes, in true chalutz spirit, cut down the bulrushes and divied the bounty around the neighborhood.

The plants looked and smelled beautiful, we all thought. Unfortunately, the bees thought so too — in such vast numbers that we humans had to take refuge in the house.

Needless to say, the experiment was never tried again. A triumph of practicality over esthetics.

Why then are we so susceptible to what "they" say?

Is it easier to go along with the crowd, to fit in with the prevailing mood or philosophy so that we won't feel alone in what can seem a very frightening world?

In the big scheme of things, it really doesn't matter if you follow the crowd and pretend to love driving in non-air-conditioned discomfort in August or claim that sharing your sukkah with insects is one way to truly commune with G-d's creation.

But it does matter if you stand by indifferently in the face of cruelty, hostility and intolerance.

It does matter if you stay silent when others say that a classmate or colleague is a cheat; that victims of AIDS are unworthy of support; that Jews of a different religious ilk are not "real Jews;" that the fate of Muslims being tortured in Bosnia can be ignored because, after all, they aren't "our people."

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are an interesting combination of "they" and "I".

The Holy Days are also, for many, the only time to come together to pray as part of a community. The Al Chet prayer, the communal confession of sins, is said as a congregation, not as individuals.

But Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are also time for individual reflection. They are a time to acknowledge not just our sins but our innate frailties and weaknesses as well.

At this solemn time of year, let us all — collectively and individually — decide that we will display toward each other the same compassion, tolerance and understanding that we pray G-d will show us.

From all of us at The Canadian Jewish News a L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu — may you be inscribed for a new year of peace, joy and contentment. — L.S

Community... according to Rav Kook

By Martin Lockshin

It is a basic truism in the Jewish community today that what we really need for our continued success and perhaps even for our survival is more tolerance and community unity.

Tolerance is a given in our Canadian society. Everybody favors tolerance. But the tolerance we have here in Canada is ultimately very limited.

Very few Canadians have much tolerance for people like child pornographers, pathological liars, plagiarists, racists or hard drug dealers. We do not generally accept their right to espouse different value systems than our own. Our pluralism has very clear limits. When we feel strongly about an issue, we rarely have much tolerance for other people's positions.

So why are we so sure that what Judaism needs today is more tolerance for the different visions of Judaism? We know well that sometimes the different movements of Judaism can teach precisely the opposite teachings about one question. One movement's approach could be considered dangerous by another movement.

Is tolerance a traditional Jewish value? Many would argue that it is not. In fact, a common opinion of quite a few 20th century thinkers is that religious tolerance has gained popularity in the modern world only because religion has lost popularity.

For people who are lukewarm or negative towards religious values — as so many 20th century people are — it is not difficult to espouse religious diversity and tolerance as a value. If religion doesn't matter, then of course tolerance of other religious views is a value. But if Judaism is really important, if it's the most important value in someone's life, maybe a little intolerance is perfectly natural?

If we wish to promote Jewish tolerance, it is probably wise that we not promote the tolerance of indifference, the pluralism that says that any Jewish approach is okay because it doesn't really matter. Can we find a model of Jewish tolerance that is connected to a passionate concern about Judaism and a firm commitment to a particular vision of Judaism? I think we can.

Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, first chief rabbi of modern-day Israel, was known and respected throughout the Jewish world of his time as a tolerant man. Kibbutzniks who had little respect for traditional religion would come to visit this great rabbi who lived a life of deep piety and stringent observance of the commandments of Jewish law.

When one reads Rabbi Kook's writings today, one often wonders how he earned that reputation. Rabbi Kook's writings very often display an attitude that is essentially the antithesis of Jewish pluralism.

Rav Kook

For example, consider the controversy about the "Uganda plan," the scheme for the creation of a Jewish homeland in Africa instead of in the land of Israel. Eliezer ben Yehudah, who is seen as the creator of the modern Hebrew language, had been one of the more famous supporters of that idea. He once wrote in defence of the Uganda Plan that, while it is true that giving up on the land of Israel could be seen as turning one's back on Jewish History, "we (= secular Zionists) have all turned our back on our historical past, and that is our glory."

Rabbi Kook was livid, both about the Uganda plan and about the way that Ben Yehudah defended it and prided himself on his discontinuity with Jewish history. Rabbi Kook wrote that it may be the case that Ben Yehudah had turned his back on Jewish history, but one need not worry. "When withered leaves like this fall off the vine of Israel, the loss is not very great." Hardly the words of an advocate of pluralism!

On another occasion Rabbi Kook was asked by some secular Zionists to write an article for a volume memorializing fallen members of the Jewish watchmen organization in the land of Israel, Ha-shomer.

Rabbi Kook obliged, but his article described at length both his pain at their loss and his pain about the fact that they were not observant Jews. The article took the editor of the memorial volume aback. He and Rabbi Kook eventually agreed not to include the piece in the memorial volume.

So how did Rabbi Kook earn his reputation as a tolerant rabbi? Why did people with no connection to his vision of traditional Judaism flock to him and honor him? There were probably two important reasons for that reputation.

First of all, Rabbi Kook had an unparalleled love of all Jews. As a result of his great commitment to Jewish mysticism, he really believed, not just on the rhetorical level, that all Jews are one and that our fates are interconnected.

But even more than that, Rabbi Kook's reputation for tolerance was a result of his willingness to raise commonality of interests above the importance of factionalism. When Rabbi Kook found that his religious-Zionist interests often overlapped with the goals of secular Zionists, he was willing and eager to highlight the things that they had in common and not dwell on the difference.

Those are two things that we can all learn from him, no matter what movement we belong to: to strive not for the tolerance of indifference but for an approach to community that is based on the love of fellow Jews and the realization that, with all of the serious and important divisions that we have in our community, we do have some crucial commonalities."

Community... according to the Rav

By Rabbi Mark Dratch

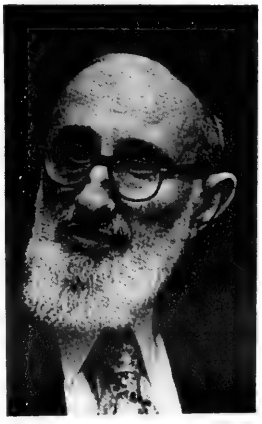
Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, zecher tzaddik livrachah, was lonely, and in his loneliness he discovered his religious philosophy. But the Rav, as he was affectionately called by his students and devotees, was not alone. Thousands flocked to his lectures, devotees continually solicited his halachic decisions and leaders often sought his advice.

He was the leading talmudist of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary of Yeshiva University, ordaining over 2,000 of its rabbis. He served as spiritual mentor and halachic authority of the Rabbinical Council of America and as honorary president of Mizrachi of America. He was the religious leader of his adopted community of Brookline, Mass., and the founder of its Maimonides Day School.

Yet, the Rav was, in the words of the title of his epic essay, "the lonely man of faith." This was not social solitude but rather the existential isolation of a contemporary whose faith values differed from those of the modern society in which he lived. It was, as well, the existential loneliness that results when a person realizes his own uniqueness and singularity as a human being. "The 'I' is lonely ... because there is no one who exists like the 'I' and because the modus existentiae of the 'I' cannot be repeated, imitated or experienced by others."

In this essay, the Rav analyzed the two biblical narratives of the creation of humankind and identified in these accounts what he termed Adam the first and Adam the second. For these two types, loneliness is overcome by becoming part of a community. Adam I, who has the challenge of subduing a hostile natural environment, confronts many tasks which he cannot perform alone. Realizing the difficulties of acting alone, he unites with others.

Adam II seeks more. He is searching for a redeemed existence and finds it in what the Rav labeled the covenantal community where "not only hands are joined, but experiences as well; there one hears not only the rhythmic sound of the production line, but also the rhythmic beat of hearts starved for existential companionship and all-embracing sympathy, and experiencing the grandeur of the faith commitment; there one lonely soul finds another soul tormented by loneliness and solitude yet unqualifiedly committed."



Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik

The convenantal community includes not only I and thou, but God as well. "If God had not joined the community of Adam and Eve, they would never have cared to make the paradoxical leap over the gap, indeed abyss, separating two individuals whose personal experiential messages are written in a private code undecipherable by anyone else." It is through communion with God and through living according to Halachah that human beings transcend their alienation and are redeemed.

The Rav also spoke about what he called the masorah (tradition) community, a "community [which] cuts across the centuries, indeed millennia, of calendric time and unites those who already played their part, delivered their message, acquired fame and withdrew from the covenantal stage quietly and humbly with those who have not yet been given the opportunity to appear on the covenantal stage and who wait their turn in the anonymity of the yet to be."

It is participation in and identification with the generations of tradition that firmly plants unrooted, alienated Jews in time, with meaningful pasts and purposeful futures.

The principles of Jewish law established the world view of Rabbi Soloveitchik, the eponym of another of his classic essays, The Halachic Man. Indeed, all of life was seen, defined and lived in halachic categories. While his religious positions were sensitive and understanding of the individuals and communities that turned to him for guidance, he did not abide deviation from Jewish law.

Nevertheless, he embraced the entire Jewish community. In fact, he disagreed with the decision of 11 prominent roshei yeshivah, which prohibited the involvement of orthodox rabbis with rabbis of other denominations and permitted the Rabbinical Council and the Orthodox Union to participate in the interdenominational Synagogue Council of America in matters of concern to the general community.

He rejected the anti-Zionist position of his upbringing and became an advocate of Religious Zionism and a leader of Mizrachi.

It has been suggested that his embrace of the larger Jewish community was based on his understanding of the two covenants, the covenant of fate and the covenant of destiny, which define Jewish peoplehood, as described in his Kol Dodi Dofek.

The covenant of fate is forged through the shared circumstances and suffering of the Jewish people and engender mutual responsibility and liability. The covenant of destiny, which is the covenant of Sinai, "consists in a special way of life which directs man's existence toward attaining a single goal, a goal beyond the reach of the man of fate, namely, man's imitation of his Creator through an act of self-transcendence ... The deeds of lovingkindness and brotherhood which are interwoven into the covenant at Sinai have as their motivating force not the Jew's strange sense of isolation, but rather his experience of the unity of a people forever betrothed to the one true God."

The Rav led the way

For the Rav, both covenants are "indissoluble and indivisible ... A Jew who participates in his people's suffering and fate but does not bind himself to its destiny, which expresses itself in a life of Torah and mitzvot, violates a fundamental principle of Judaism and impairs his own singularity. Conversely, a Jew who does not grieve over the affliction of his people, but seeks to separate himself from the Jewish fate, desecrates the holiness of Israel, even if he observes the commandments." Nevertheless, perhaps because of the covenant of fate, Rabbi Soloveitchik involved himself with the people and issues of the larger Jewish community.

In his essay Confrontation, the Rav outlined a double approach in our relationship with the non-Jewish world. "We think of ourselves as human beings, sharing the destiny of Adam in his general encounter with nature, and as members of a covenantal community which has preserved its identity under most unfavorable conditions, confronted by another faith community."

The Rav posited that we are obliged to enrich society with our creative talents and to be constructive and useful citizens, participating in every civic, scientific and cultural enterprise. Yet our souls, our personalities and our "metaphysical destinies belong exclusively to God."

Elsewhere he derives a similar lesson from the way Abraham identifies himself as both a stranger and a resident (Genesis 23:4). Thus the Rav permitted interreligious activity only in matters of secular concern, prohibiting any theological dialogue.

The Rav, through his guidance and inspiration, led the way in transforming our contemporary North American Jewish community of fate and destiny into a covenantal community of faith and masorah. May we, his disciples, continue in the path he so ably forged for us.

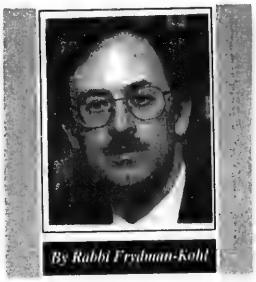
Community according to Rabbi Heschel



By Rabbi Frydman-Kohl

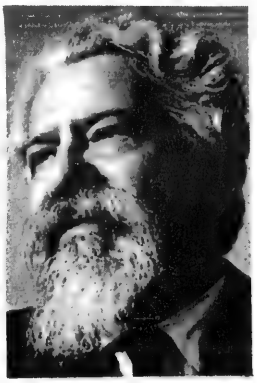
Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, the descendant of generations of chassidic rabbis and a professor of ethics and mysticism at the Jewish Theological Seminary, was one of the seminal intellectual and moral figures of Jewish religious life in the 20th century.

Although a scholar of medieval thought, Rabbi Heschel became well known for his personal exposition of Judaism. His own writing sought to expose the inner splendor of the Jewish tradition, to penetrate the lived reality of faith and to illuminate the living and dynamic relationship between God and human beings.

Rabbi Heschel's emphasis on the need for personal experience as a path to God was coupled with a distinct concern for community. Both stemmed from his awareness of the covenantal relationship between God and the Jewish people.

Writing to a non-Jewish audience, Heschel stated: "I speak as a member of a congregation whose founder was Abraham, and the name of my rabbi is Moses. I speak as a person who was able to leave Warsaw, the city in which I was born, just six weeks before the disaster began. My destination was New York; it would have been Auschwitz or Treblinka. I am a brand plucked from the fire in which my people was burned to death."

Rabbi Heschel's sense of community included the Jewish people of the present and of the past. In giving voice to that perspective, he was unsparing in his critique of the "religious behaviorism" he saw in Orthodoxy and the radical individualism he found in Reform



Rabbi Abraham Heschel

Judaism.

"Judaism is not only the adherence to particular doctrines and observances, but primarily living in the spiritual order of the Jewish people, the living in the Jews of the past and with the Jews of the present ... It is not a doctrine, an idea, a faith, but the covenant between God and the people. Our share in holiness we acquire by living in the Jewish community. What we do as individuals is a trivial episode; what we attain as Israel causes us to become a part of eternity."

Writing to a generation which found the glitter of contemporary culture alluring, Rabbi Heschel presented a vision of holiness which he believed was still present within the Jewish community.

"Israel is the tree, we are the leaves. It is the clinging to the stem that keeps us alive. There has perhaps never been more need of Judaism than in our time, a time in which many cherished hopes of humanity lie crushed. We should be pioneers as were our fathers three thousand years ago. The future of all men depends upon their realizing that the sense of holiness is as vital as health. By following the Jewish way of life we maintain that sense and preserve the light for mankind's future visions."

For Rabbi Heschel, "Belonging to Israel is in itself a spiritual act. It is utterly inconvenient to be a Jew. The very survival of our people is a kiddush hashem. We live in spite of peril. Our very existence is a refusal to surrender to normalcy, to security and comfort."

Rabbi Heschel believed that the contemporary Jewish community must be informed by an awareness and appreciation of that mission. "We do not live in a void. We never suffer from a fear of roaming about in the emptiness of Time. We own the past and are, hence, not afraid of what is to be. We remember where we came from. We were summoned and cannot forget it, winding the clock of eternal history."

That covenantal commitment is different from an intellectual concept. Rabbi Heschel wrote: "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob do not signify ideas, principles or abstract values. Nor do they stand for teachers or thinkers, and the term is not to be understood like that of 'the God of Kant, Hegel and Schelling.' Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are not prin-

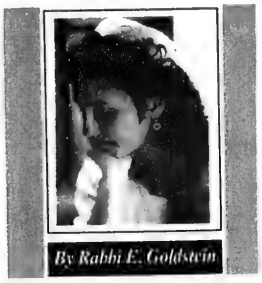
Community... according to Rabbi Borowitz



By Rabbi E. Goldstein

If we are purely cultural, non-religious — and I do not count Reform, Conservative, or Reconstructionist Jews, i.e. "liberal" Jews among those — we can express our oneness with the Jewish people by following folk customs at this time of year.

We can buy High Holy Day tickets to the synagogue of our choice and "enjoy" the tune of Kol Nidre or recitation of Yizkor. We can serve apples with honey and send cards. We can meditate on the universality of the theme of the world's birthday.

But if we are religious, Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur have a different hold on us. We go to services not only to be a part of the folk. We go to renew our covenant, to repent before the Sovereign, to strive for oneness with the One. For liberal Jews, this brings up a perplexing dilemma of modern religiosity. How do we as autonomous individuals, we who on principle profess the ability — no, the right — of each person to choose their path to God, come together as a community of common believers?

Widely recognized as one of the leading theologians of liberal Judaism, Rabbi Eugene Borowitz asks questions about community which are at the heart of Reform Judaism today in his book Renewing the Covenant. Where shall liberal Jews, who reject as unfailing truth that God's revelation came to us once in verbal form, find a compelling sense of Jewish duty?

Caring Jews — liberal Jews who take their Judaism seriously as the core of their being — find themselves increasingly conscious of the clash between two of their most powerful intuitions: personal autonomy and Jewish duty to a community. How can we be integrated when on some deep level, we find ourselves to be bifurcated — individualistic and yet communal? Oriented to the present and yet historically bound?

There is no either/or answer for a liberal Jew. We recognize that without Jewish heritage and tradition and the communal setting of standards there can be no continuity. Yet we equally recognize that we require no automatic following of regulations; we do not rely on the notion of a rule-based spirituality. The issue is one of balance. What are the proper roles of the self and the group in determining what a Jew ought to do?

The operative words here are "ought" and "do." Rabbi Borowitz writes, "Consider, for instance, the weak sense of 'ought' one can gain by esthetic validation, ciples to be comprehended but lives to be continued. The life of him who joins the covenant of Abraham continues the life of Abraham. For the present is not apart from the past ... We are Abraham, Isaac, Jacob."

[Cont'd. on page B 8]

Abraham Joshua Heschel

Rabbi Heschel was deeply conscious that the world of Eastern European Jewry had been exterminated by the Nazi barbarians. In his eulogy to that vanished world, he contended that the generations to come had a sacred task: "A world has vanished. All that remains is a sanctuary hidden in the realm of spirit. We of this generation are still holding the key. Unless we remember, unless we unlock it, the holiness of ages will remain a secret of God ... If we mislay the key, we shall elude ourselves. In this hour we, the living, are 'the people of Israel.' The tasks, begun by the patriarchs and prophets and continued by their descendants, are now entrusted to us. We are either the last Jews or those who will hand over the entire past to generations to come. We will either forfeit or enrich the legacy of ages."

In staking out the Jewish claim on history and God's claim on the Jew, Rabbi Heschel continues to challenge us: "The gravest sin for a Jew is to forget what he represents ... We are God's stake in human history. We are the dawn and the dusk, the challenge and the test."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is the spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto. All quotations in this article are taken from the works of Rabbi Abraham Heschel.

Eugene Borowitz addresses the issue of Jewish autonomy

by commending Jewish acts as emotionally rewarding and personally enriching, the 'art form' we utilize to enhance our existence ... By validating Jewish acts in terms of personal satisfaction they afford, we make Judaism only another activity that must continually prove its worth to us or be discarded. The competition is severe, for we are inundated with other possibilities of improving our lives and realizing our ideals."

Whenever a substantial conflict arises between society's and Judaism's demands on our time, energy or attention, Judaism usually loses out. That is because we expect Judaism to serve us, not the other way around. This is the danger of putting the individual first.

Yet we equally recognize the danger of putting the community first. Rabbi Borowitz gives the example of a time recently when pressure was put on American Jewish leaders by Israel to stop being so hospitable to Soviet Jewish emigres so they would be "encouraged" instead to go to Israel.

"Despite the high priority given to the needs of the State," he says. "our community could not in good conscience comply ... We believed so in the right of individuals to decide where they wanted to go that our leaders resisted the demands of the Israeli statesmen whom they normally considered to be the leaders of our people."

A second example is that when women, following the dictates of good conscience and solid learning, choose to become more involved ritually or more assertive in seeking Jewish leadership, they are often told to squash their own individual needs for spiritual attainment for the good of a "community tradition."

The liberal community completely rejects the idea that a community can impose such sanctions on half its adult population; moreover, the health of the community is in serious danger when it cuts off that spiritual potential. Rabbi Borowitz writes, "As long as Jews continue to believe that a God-given dignity inheres in each single self, a Halachah that can require the significant surrender of "conscience" will be "unacceptable."

Today's Jews must return to the notion of covenant — a personal, compelling (though not necessary halachically commanding) relationship with God. Rabbi Borowitz's theory of covenant is one of relationship. The Jewish self, he says, has its roots in the Jewish people's historic relationship with God. In every generation, that relationship broadens and changes. We are one link in that chain, but our link need not look or feel exactly like the link before us or the link after us.

Reared in a secular society which celebrates the individual, believing that each one of us has a "divine right" to practise as we wish, most modern Jews have real trouble distinguishing between personal freedom and communal responsibility. Jewish autonomy, Rabbi Borowitz says, becomes "the use of our freedom in terms of our personal participation in the people of Israel's covenant with God as the latest expression of its historical tradition."

How do we know what properly constitutes a life of convenantal mitzvah? The two most widely accepted responses, Orthodoxy and ethnic loyalty, fail me either by overemphasizing the role of culture or by overemphasizing the role of rules. I am moved by Rabbi Borowitz's call for a liberal Jewish agenda seriously seeking a sense of obligation that respects the self's autonomy and opens up the possibility of a spirituality based on relationship as well as rules.

"Jewish selfhood arises as ethnic existentiality when remaining an individuality dignified by autonomy ... In contrast to contemporary privatistic notions of selfhood, the Jewish self, responding to God in covenant, acknowledges its essential historicity and sociality. One did not begin the covenant and one remains its conduit only as part of the ongoing people of Israel."

Eugene Borowitz

Rabbi Borowitz's covenanted people, am brit, can provide a conceptual framework for the reintroduction of the concepts of common good, responsibility and commitment rather than self-interest, individual choice and self-fulfilment which have become the vocabulary of North American secular "religion." A community dedicated to tikkun olam (making the whole world a better place) and kedushah (holiness/spirituality) is an opportunity to experience transcendence and meaning.

So it is that we return, year after year, to once again strive for that balance between our self-as-individual and our self-in-relation. As in any human relationship, when we meet without hesitation the challenge between independence and interdependence, so we need to meet without hesitation the challenge of a relationship with God, a relationship with community and a healthy selfhood.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein is the director of Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning in Toronto.

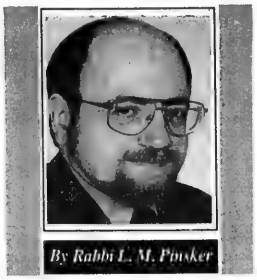
Community according to Rabbi Kaplan



By Rabbi L. M. Pinsker

Reconstructionist Judaism is the youngest and smallest of the organized religious movements in North American Judaism. It developed out of the enormous influence of the teaching of Rabbi Mordecai M. Kaplan, whose insights form the foundation of Reconstructionist ideology. Many of Rabbi Kaplan's ideas have become a part of the discourse of other movements within Judaism.

Rabbi Kaplan began his rethinking of Judaism over half a century ago as an impassioned criticism of the modern Jewish movements, which he viewed as having failed to recognize the unique challenges to Jewish life implicit in democracy and in modern education. Life in North America would not duplicate the close associations and community ties that formed the basis for Eastern European Judaism. Jews who would diversify within democracy, lost all sense of being part of a greater Jewish enterprise.

In place of older definitions of Judaism held by most Jews at the turn of the century, Rabbi Kaplan devised another way of looking at our people. We are, he said, a civilization, pluralisitic, complex, and encompassing a variety ways of expressing Jewish identity. Judaism is also an evolving and religious civilization, not a series of faith-statements or eternal truths, theologies, and rituals. Some Jews are pious, others secularists, social activists, irreligious and anti-religious, focused only on culinary habits.

If there was any glimpse of eternity in Judaism — and Rabbi Kaplan believed that there was great and enduring wisdom in it — then it lay in the living record of Jewish ideas and cultural patterns, which affirmed certain ideals over time. This was the secret of Jewish endurance: each generation of Jews is a community in time, charged with responsibility for invisioning the Judaism of its era out of inherited traditions. We add the substance of our own experience to what we have received from our parents and grandparents. The social, economic and political dimensions of life, as well as specific Jewish practices, yearnings to know G-d, habits of thought, and faith traditions, laws, customs, language, literature, art, music — all are part of Jewish life and thoughts, to be taken seriously in understanding Judaism in any era. They must also be considered in shaping the way Judaism is lived in our own time.

Mordecai M. Kaplan

All Jews strive to achieve a balance of the "three B's" of our existence — believing, belonging and behavior — so that they express what we mean when we say we are Jews. We don't deny or reject our history. We remain responsible for inherited traditions, and also for incorporating our own experience.

For Rabbi Kaplan and his students, who call their movement Jewish Reconstructionism, the concept of Am Yisrael, the Jewish people, is the key to understanding the meaning and purpose of Jewish existence, rather than focusing exclusively on Torah (or Jewish law) or on G-d or theological concerns, when defining Judaism. For some Jews, our people exist for the sake of living out G-d's plan as transmitted through Torah. For others, we exist to present ethical ideals taught by God. In Rabbi Kaplan's Reconstructionism, the Jewish people seek to know the Divine and to renew Torah as the ongoing record of their experience of what is ultimately valuable in life. The ethics and concepts of morality we associate with God are our list of ultimate concerns, a set of ideals by which we live and attempt to impart greater goodness to the world. They are valued because they have a profound impact on the quality of life, they connect people, they enable us to find strength and confidence and hope in difficult times, and they beautify life and remind us that it is possible to live a transcendent and holy vision.

Perhaps the most extraordinary feature of Rabbi Kaplan's vision of a renewed Jewish community is a changing relationship between lay and rabbinic leaders. In his concept, Jewish life would be viewed as a "work-in-progress" rather than as a finished product conferring authority on only certain individuals. In congregations and communities following a democratic pattern, decision-making power would be exercised by everyone concerned with enriching his or her spiritual life. Rabbis and other teachers would be dedicated to helping all Jews make thoughtful decisions reflecting love, caring, and devotion in every possible context and on every possible occasion.

Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker is the spiritual leader of Congregation Darchei Noam.

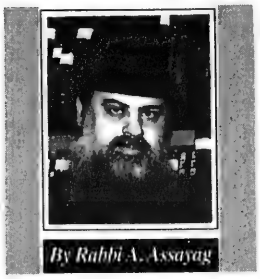
The legacy of the kehilah of Tangiers



By Rabbi A. Assayag

On a hill overlooking the blending of the Mediterranean and Atlantic oceans, the city of Tangiers stood, small in its physical structure yet ever so tall in its communal life.

As one of the ancient Jewish communities, dating back to before the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, Tangiers left a legacy for the modern community to aspire to.

From 1853, history has recorded for posterity a communal system based on self-imposed duties, to provide for every need of every individual Jew in the most respectable fashion. The kehilah was to envelop and enhance every aspect of its members' lives, thus becoming for them, the central and most vital organization.

Indisputably, the institution of the Chief Rabbinate provided the most essential services to the people. It took charge of all the religious affairs of the community and directed every element of religious life.

Its rabbinical functions included the maintenance of the beth din (rabbinical court), the management of the shchitah (ritual slaughtering), the supervision of kashrut, the overseeing of religious institutions such as synagogues, schools and mikvot (ritual baths), as well as the performance of marriages and divorces.

However, the Chief Rabbinate served beyond the ritual. All real estate transactions, subdivisions and liens had to be executed and recorded before the Chief Rabbinate, as well as wills and real gifts. Birth and death certificates could only be obtained at the Chief Rabbinate.

Education was very high on the community's priority lists. At one time, Tangiers enjoyed four different streams of schools. The Alliance Israelite constituted the public free Jewish school system. Otzar Hatorah was the private religious school. Yeshiva Torah Vehayim, later known as the Rabbinical Seminary, educated the future rabbis. Yeshivat Etz Chaim was the high-learning rabbinical institution.

Tangiers was one of the first communities that operated a nursery program known as Gan Yeladim. Their appreciation for scholarship, expressed itself by the institution of the Talmide chachamim shel bet hamedrash (aid to studying scholars).

The Jewish community of Tangiers was one of the few communities in the world that established and administered various Jewish medical institutions.

The Haim Benchimol Hospital was the general Jewish hospital, staffed mostly by Jewish doctors. In 1893, the hospital boasted the formation of a very active ladies auxiliary committee known as benot Tziyon (the daughters of Zion).

The Asilo Laredo-Sabbah, was originally established as an asylum for the demented and emotionally handicapped, and admitted shut-ins from all the Jewish communities of Spanish Morocco. As the number of these patients diminished, it was later transformed into a home for the aged.

The Salvador Hassan Maternity Ward was founded for the care of mothers and their infants. This was to be the first day-care centre.

All the above establishments were endowed by the people whose name they carry.

The sensitivity of Tangierian Jews was best confirmed by their concern for the poor. Many committees were funded to alleviate poverty at every level.

The family experiencing a temporary financial difficulty found relief in the Rodef Tzedaka Vachesed (the seekers of righteousness and kindness society). Ozer Dalim (aid for the needy) was the general monetary fund for the poor. Malbish Arumim (dress for unclothed) was a society devoted to providing clothing to poor families.

The very destitute, however, could not obtain all their needs from these societies alone. They would enrol in the chiluk (distribution), where they could secure a weekly supply of food, staples and groceries. A smaller group would come for the lechem chaluka (the bread dole). Beyond the bare necessities, the community had to satisfy other critical needs.

The Bikur Cholim (the society for sick visitation) extended itself beyond its name, to granting free physicians' consultations and dispensing free medicine.

The mohar betulot (the dowry endowment fund) expanded into contributing fully towards the bridal trousseau. The chevrat simchat chatanim (the society for the rejoicing of the bride and groom) made it its duty to be present, sing and dance at every wedding that had a very small attendance.

Tangierians' love for Israel was exemplary. Their fundraising efforts for the Yishuv abounded

The community of Jewish women

By Rachel Turkienicz

With the onset of the Jewish New Year, our traditions and our prayers emphasize an internal journey. During the time between the New Year and the Day of Atonement, known as the Days of Repentance, each person re-evaluates his or her deeds and motives of the past year and projects more positive attitudes toward the future.

Aside from the concerns we all share, there are new doors opening to women that afford both men and women the opportunity of involvement and growth as individuals and as families.

Within the Jewish community, one can find small communities of women who have taken upon themselves the commitment to search and become educated about their Jewishness. These women are to be commended, as is anyone who pursues meaning and knowledge that will impact on their lives.

And yet, to a large extent these groups of women remain on their own to struggle with modern issues and the tension they may encounter in blending their Jewishness with the world outside. I would like to suggest that the women of today reach out to a larger community of Jewish women that has been waiting silently to be discovered.

This larger community to which I refer is the core of Jewish women whose struggles, strengths and triumphs are recorded in our sources. They live in Jewish literature and some are women whose wisdom is thousands of years old. The women chronicled in the Bible and rabbinic literature encountered many of the same concerns with which women today are struggling — they are a community of women who have been waiting to speak to Jewish women for centuries. Here are but a few of its members.

Deborah — she lives in the Book of Judges. Deborah is the "work outside the home" woman. She is referred to as the wife of Lapidot; thus we know she had a husband, if not children, to worry about. Deborah is a judge, a prophetess, and ultimately the leader of the Israelite army. When Barak, the general of the army, refuses to follow her instructions and go to war, she is forced to take matters into her own hands and lead the army herself.

Yael — she lives in the Book of Judges. Yael is responsible for killing the general of the opposing army, thus ensuring an Israelite victory. Deborah praises her as "blessed among tent dwelling women." Yael is obviously the "stay at home" woman. She is not involved in the war and yet she takes action when the opportunity arises.

In the one story we see an example of two women who live opposite lives, one involved in the world at large, the other focused at home; yet they unite for a common goal and commend each other for the outcome.

Esther — she lives in the Book of Esther. This woman faces the challenge of being cast as the beautiful "plaything." Having won the royal "beauty pageant," she must ultimately overcome the illusion that outside of her physical attributes she has no worth. It is through her strategy that the Jewish people are not only spared from slaughter through the society chesed yibane (by kindness shall be built), supporting in later years the Keren Kayemet.

The kehilah in Tangiers

The community's benevolence extended to all Jews near and far. The society hachnasat orchim, which was initiated to assist wayfarers through a hospice provided for them, was to play a pivotal role during the war years, along with Mrs. Reichmann and the Vaad Hatzala, to become known as the Committee for Refugee Assistance.

This is not a complete chronicle of the charitable enterprises of the Jews of Tangiers, nor does it include the philanthropic activities of the Jews of southern Morocco. However, the Jewish community of Tangiers, numbering only 24,000 Jews at its height, serves as a model for the future development of Jewish communities worldwide.

Rabbi Amram Assayag is spiritual leader of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla in Toronto.

Deborah, Yael, Esther, and Bruria speaking to us

but become victorious over evil.

Bruria — she lives in the Talmud. This woman was married to one of the greatest rabbis of their generation: Rabbi Meir. Yet, the Talmud indicates that her knowledge was respected independently. Certain cases were not decided until someone was sent to consult with Bruria, even though her husband was present and able to vote.

She faced the challenge of a marriage where she and her husband were educated and functioning in the same "field." Unfortunately, her marriage broke down. The commentators suggest that she ended her own life in disgrace, but the text itself does not portray her in this light. In fact, on one occasion she teases a particular rabbi who has expressed extremely restrictive views regarding women. Bruria is the woman who functions within the home; yet the outside world does not allow her to remain isolated and draws her in for consultations.

Juggling their roles

The women in the community of Jewish sources have faced the challenges that women today are facing. At times they were successful and at times they failed. One sees through their eyes that they had to weigh priorities and juggle roles and opportunities — as we ourselves do. Some were successful mothers and others were not. Some were successful professionals while others were not. They tell their stories honestly.

Every Jewish person should enter the New Year questioning if they are ready to take on the commitment of learning more of their Jewishness. The community of women in our time should question whether they are ready to reach out across time and connect with the women who continue to live bound between the covers of our Jewish sources.

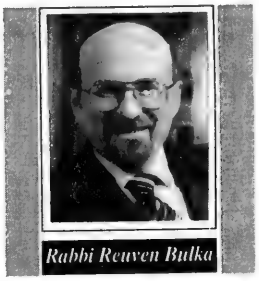
The psychology of community in Jewish tradition



Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Of all the social disorders we face in this harsh world, probably the most pervasive is loneliness.

Loneliness, to be sure, is not new. Awareness of the potential loneliness in the human condition is evident in the famous biblical statement: It is not good for the human to be alone ... (Genesis, 2:18), which more accurately reads as — it is not good for the human to be lonely.

Humans have encountered loneliness throughout history, but quite likely never as ubiquitously as now. Everyone's dream today is to have their own private home. In prison, solitary confinement is the harshest of sentences; outside prison, solitary is the public yearning!

In this post-technological era, with job or joblessness stress and the need to get away from work into some form of quiet, a home locked away from everyone else is for many a necessity.

But it all comes at a price. The price is a heavy one, in that privacy of this sort almost precludes community. And without community, when private and privacy-seeking people need support, it is not to be found.

Many people will argue that they do not need community. All they need are friends, be they family or unrelated but close confidants. That may be true, but not everyone is lucky enough to have friends who really care.

And without friends who really care, the human being is likely to be lonely. The consequences of loneliness range the full gamut, from a simply unpleasant void in one's life, to the harbinger of serious life-threatening depression.

Relatively recent surveys indicate that one out of five people in North America suffer from depression. And loneliness hits all of us at one point or another in life, and at least one-quarter are hit quite seriously.

If you think there is no relationship between loneliness and depression, then think again. The connection is real, not merely statistical. Acutely lonely people are serious candidates for depression.

There are many ways to counter loneliness, including everything from boosting self-esteem to retooling one's approach to the outside world.

But nothing is as effective in countering loneliness on a general level as the simple process of eliminating aloneness by engendering togetherness.

Togetherness is people caring for each other, putting the needs of others if not in first place, at least in significant place.

In simple, practical terms, the advantages of togetherness are concisely enunciated in the Book of Ecclesiastes (Kohelet):

Two are better than one, for they get better return for their labor. For should they fall, one can raise the other, but woe to the one who is alone, when that one falls and there is no one to pick up. If two sleep together, they keep warm, but how can one be warm alone? Where one can be overpowered, two can resist attack (Kohelet, 4:9-12).

Alone, the human being is vulnerable and sorely deficient because of that vulnerability. When the human being is together with a caring other, the danger may not be totally removed, but there is comfort in sharing the pain and the hurt.

James Lynch, in the Broken Heart: The Medical Consequences of Loneliness (New York: Basic Books, 1977), shows that those who are alone have higher mortality rates and higher incidence of serious illness.

There is obviously a distinction between being alone and loneliness. Not everyone who is alone is lonely, and some people who are in the unpleasant company of others are more intensely lonely than people who are alone.

But aloneness does conduce to loneliness and togetherness does serve to pre-empt the serious consequences of loneliness.

Jewish tradition long ago recognized this, as is evident in the famous Talmudic statement, "Either companionship or death" (Talmud, Taanit, 23a).

On a proactive level, the need for friends is so pressing that the person is advised to "Buy for yourself a friend." (Avot, 1:6).

It is in the countering of loneliness that one apprehends the most significant psychological benefit of community. The fact that community is necessary for the major events in one's life, starting even at the beginning with the ceremony of brit milah or of giving the baby her name, at the very least indicates the centrality of this relationship of the individual to community.

The community is there for the bride and groom who are overwhelmed at the thought of the exacting task of building a future that stares them in the face. At the wedding, and at the ensuing six days of Sheva Brachot gatherings, the community is there with good wishes, encouragement and hopefully support.

And finally, when one has suffered the loss of a loved one, the community is there in a most meaningful way. Just after completion of the burial, the mourners walk through a two-sided human wall of family and friends who express their condolence prayers.

This is a poignant picture of the community telling the shattered mourners, who are lonely in their grief, that they will never be alone, that the community will form a wall for them on either side to ensure that they do not fall.

But how can one best ensure that the community will be there for them in their time of need, in their loneliness crisis of happiness or sadness?

There is no better way to ensure this, and perhaps there is no other way, than by being there for the community and its members in their times of need.

Halachah and the allocation of resources

By Rabbi Jay H. Kelman

The Jewish community today, like every other one in history, is faced with the responsibility of allocating often scarce resources to its institutions. We are fortunate in that the communities in the western world are wealthier than any that preceded them. Therefore, we should be able to fund programs to ensure Jewish continuity. Yet recently, concern about Jewish continuity has become one of the main issues on today's Jewish agenda both in the Diaspora and even in Israel.

This phenomenon highlights the fact that the key to Jewish survival is not dependent on money, but rather on a strong and serious commitment to Jewish living both individually and communally. The value of finances, though, cannot be underestimated. This being the case, it is interesting to look at how previous Jewish communities arranged their communal finances to maintain vibrant Jewish life throughout the generations, as well as at how the Halachah perceives the allocation of resources.

Throughout the medieval period, under both Christian and Muslim rule, the Jews enjoyed varying degrees of autonomy, usually in return for a monetary fee exacted from the Jewish community. The community in turn funded itself through the levying of taxes. These taxes in addition to raising the money needed to pay the local government were also used to support a Jewish communal infrastructure. Institutions such as the synagogue and its religious functionaries, local schools, the mikvah (ritual bath) and charitable institutions for the poor were funded by these assessments of the members of the Jewish community.

In essence then, the Jews had a quasi-state which was recognized as such by the local ruling authorities. While the issue of the tax base often generated much controversy, Jewish law accepted the premise that for communal institutions, half the revenue should be raised on a per capita basis and half on a progressive income tax base. This compromise was based on the fact that while poor and rich equally need basic institutions such as a synagogue or a mikvah, the wealthy can better afford it and are willing to pay for extra "frills." The implication of this policy is that as we move from necessities to luxuries, the wealthy are able to and therefore should bear more of the expenses.

As important and necessary as it was to maintain religious institutions, communal leaders had to ensure the social and economic well-being of all members. Thus regulation, via the beth din (court system), was called for in such diverse areas as tort law, contracts, restraints on conspicuous consumption, advertising methods and employer/employee relations to name a few. The authority of the beth din to enforce its decisions was as a rule willingly accepted and was backed by the authority of the state. There were therefore only rare instances when it was challenged.

With the emergence of the modern period and the breakdown of the ghetto, the Jewish community lost much of its authority and power. The enlightened world now viewed the Jews as individuals and not just as a community to be tolerated when it served their interests. No longer would the non-Jewish authorities grant the Jewish community the right to enforce its own standards. As the external constraints on the community became looser the individuals of the community were freer to diffuse outward.

Economic, educational and social opportunities of the non-Jewish world were open (in theory anyway) to Jews, often for the first time. Intermarriage and assimilation, in no way near the percentage of today, were now an option. Under these circumstances (which varied widely in different communities) the structure of the Jewish community changed drastically. Many opted out of community life altogether. The focus shifted from implementing a traditional Jewish way of life in a supportive constituency to one of trying to entice Jews to get involved in the community. Tax assessments were replaced by volunteer donations of tzedakah, which frequently do not provide the funds needed to fully fund the community. This basic mitzvah requires that a minimum of 10 per cent (maximum 20 per cent) of after tax income be set aside for charitable purposes.

One of the most pressing issues has become the allocation of the limited funds raised through tzedakah. Jewish law teaches that

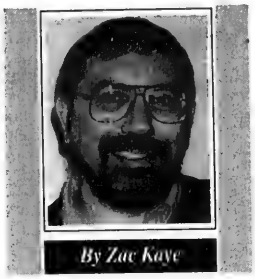
Building the campus community



By Zac Kaye

The Canadian Jewish community is undergoing vast changes as the demographic trends that have swept the United States begin to impact on Jewish life north of the border.

Three months ago, I arrived in Toronto to assume the position of executive director of a new agency to serve the Jewish needs of the over 12,000 students, faculty and staff who spend most of their daily lives on the university and college campuses here.

Nowhere are the demographic trends highlighted so clearly as on our college campuses. It is the first time for many of our young Jews to live outside of a closeted family and community oriented lifestyle. The openness and variety of opportunities that are suddenly available and the different views and new ideologies to absorb challenge the most committed person. This is especially relevant when we consider that over 80 per cent of our young people age 18 to 24 are in some form of higher education.

The assumption is that the student is prepared for this onslaught of new ideas, or indeed has taken a conscious decision that the "ghetto" is no longer a barrier to exploring new opportunities. But "free at last" takes on an entirely different connotation. Anyone doubting this should have spent the last 12 years by my side working on campus.

The west coast is not the east coast. The west coast was and is a different place, but many of the young people I came into contact with as executive director of Hillel came to Vancouver from Toronto to "escape." The irony was and is, that many of them chose to identify with the Jewish community on campus and became active participants in Hillel events.

Recognition should be given to the fact that the Jewish community has worked hard to provide lifelong learning opportunities, to build a community that provides services from the cradle to the grave. Unfortunately a flaw occurs early in the process; for many it comes to a grinding halt after bar or bat mitzvah or graduation from high school, with the possibility that it might be picked up further along life's path.

It is ironic, therefore, that Jewish education claims the largest share of federation funding in North America, with the majority of funds dedicated to the day schools and not shared proportionally with the informal sector that includes camps, youth organizations and the campus.

The Jewish experience on campus becomes a vital cog in the paradigm the community has created to ensure the continuity of our people. However, the lack of Jewish experiences, of Jewish role models, of a sense of Jewish pride, creates a "black hole" for many of our young adults.

Unless the student arrives with a strong Jewish identity or is attracted by a strong Jewish presence on campus, the potential for loss is enormous.

The physical Jewish entity on campus is not just a building. It is an opportunity — some would say a final opportunity — for the Jewish community to "build" for its young people a strong sense of their Jewish selves.

[Cont'd. on page B 18]

Community and resource allocation

our first priority must be providing the basic necessities of food and clothing for the poor and Jewish education for the children. Local needs take precedence over national and international ones, though the needs of the people of Israel are considered as if they are local. In order to contribute to the well-being of society around us, we must also allocate funds for non-Jewish causes. The tremendous expense of providing a solid Jewish education impels the community to provide assistance in this area and to make it a priority. Without educated Jews, the future of the community is really quite bleak.

Another dilemma for the community arises in the question of allowing communal resources to be used by those who are financially able but unwilling to contribute to the communal upkeep. While we do not want communal resources denied to anybody, without support these institutions cannot function effectively. Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, the great Jewish legal authority of the latter 20th century, writes that all manner of public pressure should be applied to induce payment. However, if one refuses to pay the mikvah, for example, it should still be made available to them. Threatening to deny access is likely to cause neglect of the mitzvah rather than to induce payment.

We are faced with a challenge to make Jewish life so appealing that people will gladly support the community financially and more importantly with active participation. By promoting the beautiful values of Judaism we can help ensure Jewish continuity.

Community on campus

The friendship groups that children carry through school, camp experiences and for many, the Israel trip, all contribute to a positive sense of Jewishness but in themselves are no guarantors of a Jewish future when the open society calls.

The class entering university and college this year was born in 1977, four years after the traumatic events of the Yom Kippur War, too young to remember the fateful triple handshake of Menachem Begin, Anwar al-Sadat and Jimmy Carter. They are products of the memory of intifadah, perhaps of the Lebanese War that preceded it, of an Israel that still performs miracles but is not a miracle in itself.

The issues of vicarious Judaism so strong in the '60s and '70s no longer carry a passion about them. Not with the generation whose main concern is "me" and the "job," for a future that does not appear secure.

Pride in being Jewish for many of our young people in such a setting cannot be taken for granted. So many are passive in their Jewishness, they are not only Jewishly distant, but are products of the multicultural society that is Canada today, a society where togetherness and sharing are the rule, not one where pride in being different is valued.

Yet we as a community believe that if Jewish life in Canada is to have meaning, then we have to transcend the established and accepted norms of our wider society, to ensure that ethnic and religious pride is a priority for our young people. Nowhere is this more evident than on the campus, where the pluralistic open environment is proud of its multicultural identity.

Unless you are strong in your own identity, as a student you will be easily seduced into whatever you find attractive and vital. Into this situation comes the Jewish community with its own paradigm: "Come to us, be Jewish!" But such a response is no longer relevant. "If you build it — they will not come."

The Torah "is not in the heavens" but sometimes studying it can almost take you there.

We in Jewish campus services understand that our task is to go out on campus and provide a smorgasbord of Jewish opportunities in a non-judgemental manner. In responding to societal pressures, the entity known as Hillel by many in the United States and Canada is developing an approach to the Jewish campus community that allows for a variety of views, feelings and lifestyles. Being pluralistic and inclusive is the hallmark of the Jewish campus program, within which all are valued for who they are.

Bringing together students, faculty and staff to celebrate and learn with and from each other in an open and caring environment is the new focus of campus services seeking to engage our campus dwellers wherever they are, to enable them to enjoy meaningful Jewish experiences in an atmosphere of trust that is non-threatening and where faculty serve as role models.

Parents should not delude themselves that assimilation here is not the reality it is on the west coast, that Jewish continuity is not the issue some believe it is.

We in Jewish campus services seek to be a catalyst, a facilitator working with a diverse range of partners to reach the hearts and minds of our campus community.

If we do not provide for the future leadership of our community now, there will be no leadership and no future. As the surviving generation, we have a responsibility to build meaningful Jewish lives.

In past years, Hillel was synonymous with such efforts, with B'nai B'rith and more recently the federation being the main underwriters of campus work. The emergence of centres of Jewish studies at our universities and the rich variety of Jewish opportunities are a few indications of the vitality of Jewish life in our major cities. Sad to say, only a small proportion of the approximate 25,000 young people on campus are active participants in such programs.

The new agency will challenge accepted norms and create a Jewish address on each campus that our students and faculty will be proud to identify with. We will respond to new and existing needs. We will create programs tha excite and entertain, that extend and stimulate the mind.

The scholar Hillel wrote: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? And if I am for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?" The challenge lies before us, at stake is the future of our community.

Community and the peace process

By Shira Herzog

It used to be simple. The Jewish community supported the positions of the Israeli government on security issues, on the grounds that to do differently would "give comfort to Israel's enemies." Moreover, it was argued, only Israelis could be responsible for issues relating to security, since only they would have to deal directly with the consequences. Although there were passionate, political differences of opinion within the community that dated back to the early Zionist movement, these were voiced internally. Externally, it was felt, it was essential to maintain a united front in support of the Israeli government of the day.

Today, it seems, things are hardly simple. The intense debate inside Israel over the peace process appears to be mirrored in the Jewish community and few restraints are exercised. Even mainstream organizations do not feel bound to the discipline of the past and dissenting voices from within Israel campaign actively for support in the community.

The changing dynamics in the community's view of this issue are a reflection of the evolving relationship between Israel and Jewish communities abroad, and of the changing nature of the debate over security issues inside Israel. Since the establishment of Israel in 1948, three periods can be discerned in this regard.

Between 1948 and 1977, very few questions were asked. Before the Six Day War, Israel was perceived as vulnerable and its government was viewed as deserving of unanimous support in its decisions. The Labor governments of this period included many of the leaders of the Zionist movement in the pre-state era who were known to Jewish leaders abroad. Support for Israel was equated with support for the Labor establishment.

Inside Israel, the opposition was weak, and Menachem Begin's Herut party was not considered a serious alternative to the Labor government. This period included the high of 1967, when Israelis and Jews abroad walked taller and prouder after the lightning victory of the Six Day War, and the low of 1973, when Israel's vulnerability was exposed and Israelis felt the limitations of their conventional power in the first difficult days of the Yom Kippur war.

This period also included the first wave of Labor-supported settlements in security belts in the newly-administered territories — primarily in the Jordan valley — and the early wave of settlements in the heart of Judea and Samaria by Gush Emunim, the religious settler movement. Jewish communities outside Israel subscribed to the discipline of support. In the absence of a very vocal opposition in Israel and in the absence of any serious Arab overtures for peace, this was an easy line to hold.

The national election of 1977 resulted in the first change of government in Israel. The rise to power of the Likud government led by Begin sent shockwaves through Jewish communities abroad. Israel had always prided itself on being a democracy, but surprisingly, a change of government was not something that had been naturally contemplated.

In 1977, leaders of Jewish communities confronted a brand new question: What was their role if the Israeli leadership they had traditionally supported (i.e. the Labor party) as the government of the day would now be relegated to the opposition benches in the Knesset? Since the intense political debates in the pre-state Zionist movement, there had been no such dilemma.

Israelis who disagreed with the newly elected government could voice their opinions in the give-and-take of an open democracy, but what were they to do? Nineteen years of one way of thinking and communicating were challenged virtually overnight. In 1977, as Israeli democracy started to mature, the new modus vivendi was developed: The government of the day was the government that would be publicly supported by Jewish leaders and organizations outside of Israel. The stakes were too high to publicly disagree with the policies of a duly-elected government.

Furthermore, how could support from foreign governments be encouraged and maintained through domestic lobbying activities if the Jewish community was not of one voice? Dissenters from this position claimed that the Jewish communities' political power in their own countries would be weakened by the perception that they were merely a mouthpiece for the Israeli government's policies, but in 1977, these voices were marginal.

While Begin was negotiating with Egyptian President Anwar al-Sadat, there was overwhelming support for the first official peace treaty with an Arab government. But when Israeli troops moved into Lebanon in the summer of 1982, the modus vivendi was sorely tested. This was the first Israeli-Arab war that was publicly questioned by Israelis, even as it was underway. The sight of Israeli reserve soldiers on home leave from the front demonstrating against the government was a new phenomenon for Israelis and it did not go unnoticed abroad. The limits of consensus were tested even further as the Begin government embarked upon its policy of encouraging Jewish settlement in all parts of Judea and Samaria. However, for the most part, the discipline held.

Israeli government leaders urged Jewish leaders to remember their responsibilities towards the democratically elected government of Israel, even when the latter occasionally took issue with them in private meetings. Representatives of the Peace Now movement who came to North America were discouraged from appearing at public meetings and their weak efforts to influence foreign governments were frowned upon. Israeli opposition politicians who visited North America refrained, for the most part, from actively encouraging Jewish communities to speak out against the government. The consesus held — if uneasily at times. One was reminded of Abba Eban's definition of a consensus: "Everyone agrees to say collectively what no one believes individually."

Following four years of the unique Israeli version of national unity government — during which one could support the government and the opposition at the same time — the Likud was voted back into office in 1988. And then, in 1992, the pendulum swung again. After 15 years of the country's being dominated by Likud policies, Labor's Yitzhak Rabin formed the government, with a mandate to negotiate territory for peace.

A generation of Jewish leadership that had become close to the Likud and that had shown solidarity with its policies — or at least had reacted in self-imposed silence — was faced with the familiar dilemma: The Israeli leaders they had supported were now in opposition; their role, in turn, was to support the Rabin government and its pursuit of peace.

But this time, the contours of the debate changed. Shortly after the July 1992 election, Norman Podhoretz issued a rallying cry in the pages of Commentary for public questioning of the policies of the elected Israeli government. He argued that when the state's survival was at stake, the old rules — which he had admittedly supported — should no longer apply. The September 1993 signing of the Oslo accord with the PLO lent a new urgency to the public efforts of those opposed to the process.

Settlers' organizations launched an aggressive campaign for funds and support. Most significantly, an unprecedented lobbying effort in the U.S. Congress and Jewish community was underwritten by three former Israeli officials closely connected to Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu. If progress is made in the current talks, these efforts are likely to increase. Disagreements over the Israeli government's policy on peace and war with its Arab neighbors have now broken out into the open.

In Canada, these disagreements may be milder in tone, but they are no less ideological or political. While leading Jewish advocacy organizations continue to publicly profess their support for the Israeli government's policies, they are under constant pressure from elements in the community who disagree with this position and indeed, with the underlying principles of the debate. There are some who question the wisdom of maintaining old traditions that may no longer be necessary or relevant, while others defend the principle of solidarity with the government as the only constructive way to proceed. These positions will be debated a great deal over the next year, especially as Israel approaches its national election. In discussing them, several questions are worthy of consideration.

Israeli demonstrators take to the street to protest proposed IDF redeployment on the West Bank [Israel photo]

First: How does a Jew living outside of Israel express his or her political views in the absence of the ability to vote? This question perhaps more than any other highlights the inherent ambivalence in the worn slogan, "We Are One." While many Jews sincerely feel that their fate is inextricably linked to that of Israel, they are not full participants in that country's decision-making process — by definition. Israelis vote their parties in and out of office. Jews outside of Israel react to these events. Even the debatable practice of donating money from abroad to Israeli political parties does not compare to the employment of the voting citizen and his or her capacity to shape events. How does a community committed to supporting the State of Israel react to the shifting political sands there?

Second: What is the nature and depth of the information we receive? We are exposed to the loudest voices of opposition from Israel, but they are not necessarily the most representative. The militant settlers of today are no more representative of a majority of Israelis than Peace Now was a decade ago. We only hear the voices that go to the trouble to invest time and money to lobby for support and to raise funds abroad. But we don't hear from ordinary Israelis.

I am reminded of Tom Friedman's discussion of Israeli public opinion in his book, To Jerusalem and Back. To really find out what the people were thinking, he would stroll over to his neighborhood grocer, Sasson. We do not talk to Sasson — but most Israelis are like Sasson. They discuss politics in Hebrew over Friday night family gatherings or on the beach, and they are far removed from the sophisticated political rhetoric used to generate support by political organizations on either the left or the right. Israelis like Sasson can hold apparently contradictory views — they can question concessions to the PLO and at the same time oppose the position of the militant settlers; they can consider voting for Benjamin Netanyahu in the upcoming direct elections for prime minister in 1996 and at the same time consider voting Labor for the Knesset list in the same election.

Third: How sensitive are we to the complex web of pragmatic considerations faced by Israelis? It is easier to maintain a firm ideological position on any issue the farther one is removed from the day-to-day exigencies of the situation. At the end of the day, Israelis look at one other and realize that they have to emerge together at the other end of the debate. For most Israelis, there is nowhere else to go because they don't want to go anywhere else. Israel is home — small, intense, overheated — but home nevertheless. The way the debate is conducted today will have a profound impact on the way they will live together in that small space tomorrow. That is why, as polarization has developed in some quarters of Israel, voices have emerged calling for moderation for the sake of the future fabric of Israeli society.

Communities living outside of Israel don't have quite the same imperative. There is more breathing space in the expanses of North America and the numerous options it offers for Jewish involvement, even for those who feel alienated from the positions of the mainstream.

This is further complicated by the relative stakes in the debate. For every Israeli, on either side of the debate, survival and the quality of their lives are at stake. Each side attaches a different priority to the existential issues of democracy, security and the Jewish character of the state — and the relationship between these principles. But they all care about the kind of country that they and their children will live in. Thoughtful Israelis recognize that no single ideology can satisfactorily reconcile all of these and yet they know that only with pragmatic compromise can they move forward. No matter how close Jews outside of Israel feel to the country, they do not feel these daily pressures in the same way. Security, democracy and the Jewishness of the state take on a different meaning the greater the distance from Ramat Gan or the Knesset.

As we ponder these questions, we should note that what goes around, comes around. Israel is a democracy and its governments will change. The government of today may be the opposition tomorrow and it may react in kind. In addition, as communities faced with our own challenges of Jewish commitment and continuity, we have a particular perspective. We have supported Israel not just as the fulfilment of the Zionist dream but as a value that enriches Jewish life and that provides a focus for Jewish identity and participation.

If the policies of the government of Israel can be subject to open debate and active questioning, will we be able to maintain the value of support for Israel based on a fundamental respect for its democracy and the collective wisdom of its citizens? Will "support for Israel" become a forum for political debate and posturing? Will the positions we take on the peace process enhance our sense of of community or will they be divisive? Will we still be able to speak of a shared destiny in spite of political differences, or will this become an increasingly hollow sentiment? And if so, what will be the ramifications for our sense of kehillah and klal Yisrael?

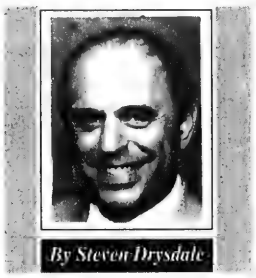
How communities define themselves



By Steven Drysdale

I have come to the realization that Jewish communities the world over define themselves by what they want visitors from elsewhere to see or experience. It is what the host shows off to the guest that clues us in on self-definition of a community.

Somehow it is the individual's attachment to the institutions and accomplishments of one's community that contributes to an understanding of how a community sees itself. This is most poignantly true even in those communities that have ceased to exist.

I remember visiting the Jewish cemetery in Warsaw and being shown the graves of the great actress Ida Kaminska and of Ludwig Zamenhof, the originator of Esperanto. They defined a community of scholarship and tradition, of reverence for our folk culture and involvement in the modern world. The tour of the cemetery taught me something about how Warsaw Jewry saw itself. (The rest of what one is shown in Warsaw is a monument to Nazism, not Judaism.)

I recall visiting the Jewish day school in Madrid a number of years ago. The community was very proud of this school which was the first to open since the 1492 expulsion from Spain. The school, now populated mostly by North African French-speaking Jews, defined the community as the successor to the Golden Age of Spain at the same time that it bore witness to a hopeful future for Jewry in Spain.

In Morocco, a visit to the graves of revered Jewish saints to celebrate the Hiloula defines the community as one that respects scholarship and the special legacy left to the community by the pious and the learned. It connects the current generation to its glorious past.

In Florence it is the magnificent Moorish synagogue; in Charleston, the oldest synagogue in the United States. In Paris it is Goldenberg's in the Pletzl and the Rue Copernic Synagogue where in both places brutal bombings shattered the myth of security in the French Jewish community.

I recently visited Ukraine, and in the small town of Khmielnitsky met with the president of the community. He spoke at length about how proud they were of their new Jewish library which would be the spark for a renaissance of Jewish learning in Khmielnitsky. A Jewish library to me was the Jewish Public Library in Montreal, so I was taken aback to find that the library being heralded consisted of a few shelves in an unused closet with a few dozen books and tapes courtesy of the Joint Distribution Centre. But to the people of Khmielnitsky that meager library defined who they were becoming.

I am most familiar with Montreal, and I have the opportunity of showing off the community to many visitors. A community such as ours is endowed with so many institutions of today and so many sites of yesteryear that it is hard to know where to begin.

Probably the two most visited sites are the Jewish Public Library and the Holocaust Memorial Centre. The former still bespeaks a community that has its contemporary roots in the massive wave of Yiddish speaking immigrants that hit these shores at the beginning of the century. The latter is testimony to the deep identification with the world of European Jewry that was lost during the Holocaust and the fact that Holocaust survivors make up such a large proportion of our community.

Individual must connect to something bigger

The smoked meat sandwich and the Montreal bagel are loved by all the citizens of Montreal and are pointed to as proof positive of the important influence of the Jewish community to the culture at large. Though rather mundane, these gastronomic specialities when added to respected institutions like the Saidye Bronfman Centre define our contribution to a multicultural society.

Why do I cite examples in the context of a High Holy Day piece on Jewish community? It is because in these places and in many others that I have had the great privilege of visiting in recent years, the sense of community is transmitted through those things about which the community is proud. One cannot have a common identity without reference to the institutions of the community. It is only when an individual connects to something bigger than himself that he breaks his isolation and becomes a community member.

To be a true member of community he must take an interest in the institutions of the community, one must support them and help them grow, one must be proud of them. One must earn the right to show them off to the visitor from elsewhere as the communal achievements that they took part in bringing to fruition.

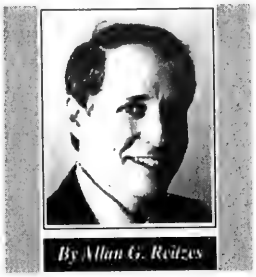
Community and Federation



By Allan G. Reitzes

Outside of its religious dimension, we can partially define Jewish community as a manifestation of three core Jewish values: klal Yisrael (the sense of unity of the Jewish people); areivim zeh bazeh (mutual responsibility); and tzedakah (social justice).

Although great things can be achieved by individuals, it is only when we work together, sharing determination strength and resources, that we can set and achieve goals for the sake of the betterment of the community, locally, nationally and around the world. The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is the practical expression of this desire to work together for the sake of the community.

At all levels of its operation and in as many ways as possible, the Federation attempts to incorporate these three core values into the formulation of our goals and objectives.

For example, the unity of the Jewish people is expressed in the composition of the Federation Council, which has representation from almost every Jewish community agency, school and organization. The Council meets at least once a year to elect the Federation leadership, and whenever there is an overarching issue which requires this representative body to convene.

Mutual responsibility is expressed in our system of voluntary community social, cultural and educational institutions. While the services are delivered by Jewish community professionals, volunteers are often at the centre of service delivery and make the policy that governs our agencies and schools. Moreover, our community is a partnership with the Jews of Canada, world Jewry and the people of Israel in collective responsibility one for the other.

Social justice, or the sharing of ourselves, is expressed through voluntary annual contributions to the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaign. Through UJA, we share in the mitzvah of helping others by sustaining the lives of poor Jews and children in Jewish education, fighting anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, assisting new immigrants and helping with the rescue and resettlement of Jews to Israel.

The help Federation extends to others is felt in a number of activities. Lifelong Jewish learning and in particular, Jewish day school education has been our community's priority. Through the Board of Jewish Education, working with day elementary and high schools and supplementary schools, we seek to enhance the Jewish education of the approximately 9,000 students. UJA-funded scholarships are provided to over 2,000 day school students. Further support of these students is delivered by the Jewish Vocational Service Guidance and Counselling Program.

Through Jewish Family & Child Service, we support Jews in chronic and short-term financial distress. Support of the Bathurst and Bloor Jewish Community centres is focused on membership and program scholarships for those who cannot afford full fees.

Outreach and Jewish programming for Jewish university students and new immigrants is both a local and national commitment.

In the context of Jewish continuity and complementing our investment in Jewish education are a variety of modest Jewish cultural initiatives, such as the annual Jewish Book Fair and Yiddish concerts.

Together with Canadian Jewish Congress, national and regional, we offer Holocaust education and fight against the evils of anti-Semitism.

The Jewish Agency for Israel is our partner in the rescue of fellow Jews, beginning with the survivors of the Shoah, followed by Jews from Morocco and Yemen, Romania and Ethiopia, and now the former Soviet Union. Through the Jewish Agency, the world Jewish community joins together to accomplish this sacred mission.

Not specific to the major activities, other important community assets are Jewish Women's Federation, the Kashruth Council, Ontario Jewish Archives, committee for Yiddish, Holocaust Memorial and Remembrance and the Jewish Campus Agency. The Federation also has a close relationship with the Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park.

To support the key activities, the Federation has four functional and integrated dpartments: campaign, planning, allocations and human resources department. The essence of each of these departments is volunteer leadership.

The key activities, goals, strategy and plans of the annual campaign are set by volunteers. Donors are asked to contribute by these same volunteers. The priorities and planning for social, cultural, educational and integration services are set by volunteers. Our human resources department recruit, train, place and continue to educate the volunteers.

All allocations are recommended by a network of committees and finally determined by the boards of directors and governors.

Allan Reitzes D.S.W., is the executive vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Joseph (J.B.) Salsberg...a longstanding activist

Catching up with J.B.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — People keep asking, "Where is J.B.? Why isn't he writing his column anymore? Is he well? And how is Uncle Eliezer?"

A recent visit with Joseph B. Salsberg (known to all as J.B.) answered these questions and more.

J.B. had a fall in his apartment. He hit his head on the sharp edge of the door post and had to be hospitalized. He has been recuperating at home and says he is well on the way to a full recovery.

One of the most beloved and most fascinating personalities in Canadian politics, J.B., who was born in Poland in 1902, still has a twinkle in his blue eyes and a refreshing sense of humor. This, along with his charisma, made him much in demand as a labor leader, politician, writer, speaker and communal worker.

In his own inimitable way, he answers each question with an evasive twist. When asked how long he wrote for The CJN, he quipped, "A helluva long time — from the day it started." Describing Uncle Eliezer he explained that he created the lovable Uncle Eliezer because it gave J.B. an opportunity to bring out a traditional Jewish reaction and point of view to events occurring in the Jewish community.

"I got to love Uncle Eliezer because he became a symbolic wise Jewish uncle who had his own opinions — not belligerent but with a sense of humor, yet very persuasive." J.B. says that Uncle Eliezer became real to many people. "I still meet people who ask me to bring back Uncle Eliezer."

He told The CJN that he hopes to start writing again before long. But he has some reservations. "When you write, you must take a position. I am no longer so quick to arrive at a yes or no answer. I think this is more mature — perhaps a sign of wisdom."

The persona of this mild-mannered and soft-spoken gentleman hides the dynamic, controversial activist, leader and politician whose odyssey has been recorded in Canadian history.

He recalls his childhood in Lugov, Poland. His parents, Avraham and Sarah Gittel (Kleinmintz) were observant. Before the family immigrated to Canada, his mother took her 10-year-old son to the rabbi because she and the family were worried about the evil influence America would have on him. After discussing her concerns with the rabbi, J.B. recalls that the rabbi lovingly pinched his cheek and said, "You can take him to America, he will be all right."

On their arrival in Toronto in 1913, his father took him to his Chestnut Street shtiebl, a landsmanshaft of people who came from the same area in Poland. "Everyone knew that the rabbi had knipped my cheek — which was an honor," he says. "The rabbi in Poland was right. I was OK in America, but not the way the rabbi thought I would be."

His father was one of the founders of the Eitz Chaim Schools and took a lifelong interest in Jewish education. His mother served as president of the Eitz Chaim Schools Ladies Auxiliary. They hoped that their son would follow in their traditional footsteps.

During the day he was a student at Landsdowne Public School, in the evening and on weekends he went to his father's shtiebl. His father tried to steer him to a yeshivah in New York. He left school at age 13 to help support his family and went to work as a leather cutter making purses at a factory.

Employers were not allowed to hire children under 14 years of age. When an inspector would come to the factory, the boss would say, 'Joey, go hide out on the fire escape. Part of his duty, he recalls, was to wait outside after work with other boys to push the boss' car to get it started, so the boss wouldn't have to crank it.

His friendship with Chaim Langer influenced the direction of his life. Langer later headed the International Ladies Garment Workers Union. Despite his parents' objections, J.B. and Langer secretly began attending meetings of the Young Labor Zionists.

A visit with Uncle Eliezer

While still in his teens, he was sent to New York where he became the general secretary of the Young Po'alei Zion of America, the socialist wing of the Zionist movement. He became the editor of its weekly youth newspaper in New York.

J.B. says that it was the General Strike in England in 1926 that shocked the labor movement and steered him into his role as a leader in the labor movement, pushing him more to the left. Again, his father tried to break him away from this secular world for he felt it was stealing his son.

Despite threats by his father, he stood his ground believing that, "I have a right to read what I want and to do what I believe is right." He was active in the trade union movement and served as Canadian vice-president of the Hatters' International Union.

There was a great resurgence of Yiddish culture in Russia and J.B. and thousands of other North American Jews became pro-Communist. He joined the Communist party in 1926 and became a member of the Central Committee.

He married Dora Wilensky, a social worker who later headed the Jewish Family and Child Services. She had graduated as a teacher, specializing in German and French, but as was the case with Jewish teachers at the time, she was unable to get a position in Toronto. She became nationally prominent in the field of social work.

With tears in his eyes, J.B. said, "My love for Dora lasted all my life — and it still continues."

J.B. became involved in politics and was elected an alderman for Ward 4 in 1938, a position he held until 1943 when he was elected to the Ontario Legislature as a Labor Progressive Party member defeating John J. Glass, a Liberal and active member of the Jewish community.

J.B. remembers with great satisfaction the night he was first elected to the legislature. After speaking from a fire escape on Brunswick Avenue at College Street to hundreds of people, the crowd marched down Spadina Avenue on their way to an auditorium.

One person shouted, "Let's go to J.B.'s parents' home on Cecil Street." Despite their earlier resistance to his direction in life, he says his parents were very proud of him. His mother told the gathered crowd, "May the Lord bless you all to have children like mine."

As an elected representative, people came to J.B. with every problem imaginable — land, immigration, jobs, welfare and personal matters. Involved with protest marches, skirmishes with the police, and as a favorite bandstand speaker, he became a well-known Canadian political figure.

An ardent Zionist, after World War II, J.B. hoped for a Jewish state in Palestine with the former Soviet Union's active support. But Soviet policy towards the State of Israel was soon to turn from support to hostility and to active anti-Semitism in Stalin's last years.

J.B. represented St. Andrews riding for 12 years and became known as an eloquent spokesperson for anti-discrimination laws. It was during Premier George Drew's government that J.B. was able to have a bill passed which outlawed discrimination in public places. This was a breakthrough in fighting discrimination in Ontario.

And later, his friendship with the Conservative premier, Leslie Frost, resulted in the naming of a township in the Thunder Bay district — the Salsberg Township. He was defeated by Allan Grossman in 1955.

The anti-Jewish policies in Russia during the 1950s, led to J.B.'s disillusionment with the Communist party. "I was disturbed by what was happening in the Jewish area in the Soviet Union — more and more Jewish institutions were closed, rumors of murders became rampant.

"First I went to see the Russian ambassador in Ottawa. I had a feeling that he was embarrassed in what he could tell me. So I said that I wanted to go see for myself for until I would be there myself, I would not speak out on Russian Jewish matters. So I decided to go there."

In 1957, J.B. went to Russia where he was confronted with the truth of the rampant discrimination in Eastern Europe. He met with Nikita Khrushchev, leader of the Communist party. Khrushchev asked J.B. not to make a public issue of the Jewish situation because it would become anti-Soviet.

Using the analogy of a getting a difficult horse to obey, Khrushchev warned, "Beware, the enemy will ride you. They do it very gently — they will gently stroke you, put you in a blanket, throw a saddle on you, grab you with a rope and when they have you, they will ride you." J.B. replied that "nobody ever rode and no one will ever ride me. When I came back to Canada, I realized that the only way things could be helped and improved was to go public."

On his return to Canada, he wrote a series of articles on his Russian visit in the Vokhenblat, a German Jewish weekly. He broke with the Communist party of Canada and along with leaders, Morris Bidderman and San Lifshitz, left the Communist-dominated fraternal group, the United Jewish People's Order, taking with them a considerable number of its members. They formed the New Fraternal Jewish Association of Toronto — a left-wing group free of Russian ties.

J.B. established the Model Insurance Agency Ltd. in 1957. He became active on behalf of the State of Israel and for the resurgence of Yiddish. He became active in the Canadian Jewish Congress and a senior's activist at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Looking back, J.B. says that he has no regrets about his life. "I went with my heart and my mind. I tell young people to fight for genuine democratic process — no dictatorship of any kind." He emphasizes that it is important to have respect for the individual's right to think, speak and write.

"If I want the rights for me, I cannot deny the rights to others." Citing Ernst Zundel, he adds that "I cannot deny Zundel his rights, but I would go out and fight him tooth and nail. When they cross the line between an expression of an opinion and set themselves up as a guiding force, then it's time to openly oppose them."

Although J.B.'s accident has taken some of his physical strength, it has not taken any of his youthful spirit. When approached for this interview, he said, "You must be scraping the bottom of the barrel. We can make this interview in one sentence. If you want me to reflect on my life, I'll just give you a mirror."

Asked to describe himself, J.B. says, "I am a Jew — a Yid — everything else flows from that."

One of the highlights in his life, he says, is his ongoing relationship with individuals from the former Labor Zionists, some 10 or 12 people who meet every Saturday night "to sit around and talk and exchange our views." And he adds, "My long association with The CJN was a very important factor in my life.

"I value everything that is advancing the physical and economic well-being of all people and reaffirming and strengthening the everlasting tie with the Jewish State of Israel. And above all, I am very proud of the J. B. Salsberg Medical Centre that was established in Kuryiat Yam in Israel in my honor."

Searching in Marrakech for peace from one's past

By BRIGITTE DAYAN

On a warm, October evening in Marrakech I met the rabbi who held a key to my past.

I made my way through the throngs of Americans and Moroccans socializing with each other by the poolside of our elegant hotel. Buffets laden with exotic Moroccan specialties — couscous, chicken and olives, shishkebab — lined the perimeter of the gardens. The spices pierced the senses and the area was abuzz with the blissful enjoyment of vacationers.

But for this brief period, I remained oblivious to the sounds and smells around me. I was absorbed by my mission to find out as much as I could about my great-grandfather, a revered Moroccan rabbi who lived during the first half of the 20th century.

During the late afternoon, I had made about a dozen phone calls to members of the Jewish community, numbered at 350. I explained to each person that I am a Dayan, that my family's roots are in Marrakech, and that I was looking for anyone who knew my great-grandfather and could tell me stories about him.

Each call led to a dinner or Shabbat invitation — none of which I had time to accept — and the name of another community member who might help me. Everyone seemed to point to Rabbi Shalom Gabbai, the sole remaining rabbi in the city.

I found him and his wife by the buffet, stacking food on their plates. He was a friendly man in his 50s, with a full head of whitened hair, no doubt the result of caring for the spiritual needs of a dwindling, but vibrant community.

I interrupted his meal and, with the swiftness of an expert diver, launched into an explanation of who I was and why I had come to my ancestral Marrakech. With a smile emerging indicating familiarity with my last name, he told me the community records contained many Jewish legal documents authored and signed by my great-grandfather.

"Come tomorrow night to the kollel and I will show them to you, so that you can see his signature," he told me in French.

He told me the kollel's address, giving me a street name, but no number. "Don't worry," he said. "Just take a taxi to the street and ask someone to show you where it is; everyone knows the kollel."

Sensing my hesitation to venture alone after nightfall to an unfamiliar neighborhood in an Arab land, he added a very unconvincing, "It's safe."

The next day, I debated whether to go. Finally, I reasoned that I simply could not leave Morocco without some of my great-grandfather's papers in hand. Rabbi Gabbai hadn't said anything about letting me take them, but I had my own agenda.

When it came time to meet the rabbi, I flagged a taxi outside our hotel. I was equipped with a self-imposed and quite romantic sense of filial duty and, perhaps more importantly, a male friend from my American tour group. The fact that he was barely taller than me and certainly much thinner didn't daunt me — yet.

As we rode in the taxi, I was absorbed in my thoughts, having already painted a larger-than-life fantasy about retrieving, at great risk, documents belonging to my family, and coming home to a hero's welcome. But as if to shatter my notions of Middle Eastern danger, the taxi driver seemed interested only in picking our brains about why Michael Jordan had chosen to leave the Bulls.

He took us to the right street, but unsure as we were of the kollel's exact location, he graciously accompanied us out of the cab to seek outside help.

Although I was already fearful, I was totally unprepared for the sight that greeted me. Mobs of people were in the street and the loud sounds of Arabic permeated the air.

The women, dressed in long, black dresses and veiled, so that only their curious eyes peered through, were scurrying home carrying packages filled with fruits and vegetables. The men, sporting the traditional Arabic jelabias and keffiyahs, were manning the storefront shops, selling anything from nuts to electronics.

And I have never felt so out of place, with my GAP shirt and skirt sticking to my skin as if to remind me of my difference.

We approached an electronics merchant and the taxi driver asked him for directions. He seemed confused by the term "kollel." Do you want the synagogue, he asked me?

Afraid to answer yes, and thereby confess my Jewishness, I opted for silence.

"The Jewish mosque?" he persisted.

Yes, I nodded with all the strength I could muster.

He smiled a large smile and as he began to lead us to the kollel, he told me he knew Rabbi Gabbai very well.

The electronics merchant took us down the street and around the corner to a rather decrepit building, with a narrow, dark staircase. We made our way up and breathed a sigh of relief at the sight of a mezzuzah.

Rabbi Gabbai was seated next to two elderly gentlemen. They had a large Gemara open in front of them. I waited at the entrance with bated breath and the exhilaration of anticipation.

The rabbi understood. He walked to a tall wooden chest, unlocked it with a key and took out a large book, with the edges of its yellowed pages sticking out.

As he was leafing through the community records for ketubot that my great-grandfather wrote, one of the men told me he went to school with my great-uncle and knew my great-grandfather.

"What can you tell me about him?" I implored.

"Well," he said, "he spoke very fast, just like you."

Just then, the rabbi called my attention to a ketubah written and signed by my great-grandfather in 1934. And there, at the bottom of a text on a faded page, it clearly read, in Rashi script: Shlomo Dayan.

For a fleeting moment I felt closely connected to these three strangers. Their community was my community, not merely in the lofty sense that all Jews are interconnected and are responsible one for another, but a very real and direct way. Geography had distanced us perhaps, but we were borne of the same soil.

I beseeched the rabbi to let me bring the originals home, so that I could show my father. I promised to send them back to him via Federal Express, but he staunchly refused.

"These documents belong to the Jewish community and you can't take them out of this room," he said.

In a city whose Jewish population was once among the most vibrant in the Sephardi world, all that is left are the legal documents to prove it. The rabbi was right; I couldn't take them.

I settled for photocopies of three ketubot written and signed by my great-grandfather. After posing for a picture with the men, and expressing my genuine thank you, I took off with my patient companion for the cab that awaited us outside.

I had stood on the ground where my great-grandfather prayed, learned, ate and slept. And in the process, I retrieved, for the sake of posterity, a precious symbol of his life.

HI!!! HOLIDAYS..

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

Welcome to CJNews for Kids. One of the special parts about Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is that you have lots of chances to make things better for yourself and for other people. You can make small changes like being nicer to your brothers and sisters or your friends. You can help a person who is hungry or who needs clothing or shelter. You may not be old enough to fast but there are other ways to be a part of this holiday.

"L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu," is how you greet people and it means, "may you be written in the book of life for a good new year."

BACK IN TIME

To learn of the traditions for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur let's go back a long time ago to the year 1700 BCE. Abraham and Sarah are travelling through the desert to the promised land. At night they rest and look up at the sky. After a really long time they notice the moon always changes its shape, getting smaller and then bigger in some sort of regular pattern. Abraham and Sarah believe that G-d is responsible for these changes. They call this the new month and to celebrate each new moon they blow the ram's horn. The new moon celebration of the seventh month gets the longest and loudest blasts on the ram's horn. The seventh month is the holy month in which we now celebrate Rosh Hashanah.

Time passes and it is 955 BCE and King Solomon builds the Temple. Again, the seventh month is important because the Temple is dedicated in this month.

Around 586 BCE the Babylonians celebrate a holiday where they write their names on tablets and have a day of judgment. This is similar to the book of life in which G-d decides our fate. The book is open for 10 days and you think about all you have done during the year and what you can do better. The book is closed at the end of Yom Kippur.

The Canadian Jewish news for kids

The Temple of Solomon is destroyed and it isn't until after the Jews return from exile that the Second Temple is built. It takes 23 years to finish. A man named Ezra returns to Judah from Persia and reminds the Jewish people about practising the rituals. Ezra reads the Law of Moses in public and people are so touched by this reminder that many Jews begin again to follow the rituals of Judaism. The sages make two holidays Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

When the Temple was destroyed Jewish people start to dress in white during the holiday of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. This helps them feel pure and simple before G-d. They also cover the Torah in white to be pure. Today you will see white table cloths, and rabbis and some men in the synagogue who wear a kittel or white robe. Women often wear white as well.

Take a big jump in time and you are now in the time of the 1400s and the Jews in Spain are ruled by a very cruel leader. Jewish people are forced to pray secretly. You listen to the sounds of them singing the Kol Nidre on the holiest night of the year. The sad and beautiful music reminds you that many Jewish people have suffered over the years.

Now you are back to the present and Rosh Hashanah has begun. You eat honey and apples and listen to the sound of the shofar blowing and think how lucky you really are!

Crafts & Activities

1)Years ago people took a chicken, waved it over someone's head and after killing the chicken, gave it to a poor person. This was called "kapparot" and was supposed to bring a long peaceful life. People now wave money instead of a chicken and then give the money away. Ask your family if they would like to give kapparot money.

2) You can collect extra clothes your family has to give to JF&CS's Just A Second shop at 3418 Bathurst St.

3) For hundreds of years on the afternoon of Rosh Hashanah, Jewish families have taken a walk to a river or stream. You turn your pockets inside out and by throwing bread crumbs into the water you throw away your sins. This is called Tashlich.

4) Make fabric paper for New Year's cards. Shred used paper, put in a blender and add water. Take the pulp out Hiof the blender and put it in a bin. Scoop out the pulp and spread it flat on a piece of screen. Don't leave any holes, let the water drip out. Let it dry on the screen, add dried leaves, flowers, food coloring or sparkles.

5) Weave your own challah cover with scraps of old fabric from ripped clothes. Cut strips 1 inch wide and 12 inches long and weave away! Sew or tape or glue edges.

WHAT IS EACH SENTENCE REALLY ABOUT?

1) You pray for forgiveness and a blessing for a good year.
2) You return to G-d by doing mitzvot good deeds, and saying sorry for the bad things.
3) You are doing this when you give to needy people.
4) It is made from a ram's or goat's horn. The sound of it tells us the start of the holiday, that G-d is ruler and judge, and reminds us of the Jews who got the Torah at Sinai.
5) You know this is called the head of the year or the day of sounding the horn.
6) You know this as the day of atonement when you are sorry for what you have done and you think of others who suffer.

Here are your choices:
a) Shofar
b) Tshuvah
c) Yom Kippur
d) Tfillah
e) Rosh Hashanah
f) Tzedakah

ANSWERS:

1) Tfillah
2) Tshuvah
3) Tzedakah
4) Shofar
5) Rosh Hashanah
6) Yom Kippur

L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu!

..JUST FOR KIDS

SWEET, SWEET FOOD!

You dip apples in honey for a year as good as the apple and as sweet as honey. Challah is made with a ladder or crown because G-d is spoken of as King or Ruler. Challah can also be in the shape of a bird with wings so your prayers can fly up to heaven.

GREAT CHALLAH
Dissolve 1/2 cup of sugar in 1/2 cup of warm water in a mixing bowl that has first been rinsed with hot water.
Sprinkle yeast on top and let stand for 10 minutes.
Stir.
Mix with 1/2 cup oil, 1/2 cup warm water, 1/4 cup sugar, 2 tsp salt, 2 eggs and 2 cups of flour.
Beat well.
Stir in 2 more cups of flour.
Cover sticky dough for 10 minutes.
Turn onto a floured board and have fun kneading for 10 minutes adding flour if you need to.
Round up in a greased bowl. Cover and let rise in a warm place for 1 to1 1/2 hours.
Punch down and leave it for 45 minutes
Take a little dough for making a crown or ladder then divide the rest into 3 parts, shape each part into long strands and braid loosely on a greased baking sheet.
Fasten the ends well and cover until double. Make your ladder or crown and add to challah.
Brush with egg yolks and bake at 400 degrees for 30 minutes.
Cover top with foil at ends so it doesn't burn.

LETTERS TO LINDA

Dear Linda,
I want to let you in on a little something that I do every week. I feel it is important to tell you about this because the season of giving is approaching.
When my parents and I were talking about allowance I said I wanted to save up some money for the homeless. Every week when I get my allowance of three dollars, I put one dollar in my "homeless fund." At the end of the year I end up with about $50 dollars and I distribute it to different charities.
The more people do this the more money is raised and people helped.
Sincerely,
Bryan Samis, age 12

Shanah Tovah!
Please send me a short letter telling me what you do for tzedakah or making things better for other people. Mail your letters to Linda Ander, c/o CJNews for Kids, 10 Gateway Blvd. Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont.

Jewish education in Victoria to get proper home

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

A home for Jewish education for children and adults of all ages is in the advanced planning stage in Victoria, at an estimated cost of $1.5 million.

The building will be physically linked to the 132-year-old Congregation Emanu-El and will function as part of the synagogue.

The need to provide proper Jewish education facilities for the burgeoning Jewish population here has been a topic on the syngogue agenda for a number of years. When Charlotte Atlung Sutker was president six years ago, she moved the matter to the top of a priority wish list. A dwindling population in the immediate post-war years had discouraged attempts to build a school, but in recent years the community has come back to life.

Now, former Torontonian Lisa Shendroff, the chair of the building task force, says architectural plans are almost complete and she is hopeful the congregation will put approval on a fast track so a building fund campaign can get under way after the High Holy Days.

The synagogue has 175 member units totalling about 500 congregants, while the estimated total Jewish population of the city is about 1,500 and growing.

Rabbi Victor Reinstein has his office in his home and sometimes has to use the shul kitchen for meetings, because the sanctuary is being used as the school.

The rabbi is confident that, despite the comparatively small population, the new school will be built. He cites Herzl's dictum that "if you will it, it is no dream."

Present school attendance is 60 boys and girls, ages five to 12 years in grades 1 to 6, with eight teachers — all conducting classes at the same time, three afternoons a week.

Add to this a bar and bat mitzvah class of 13 which meets in a private home, plus 32 preschoolers from 18 months to kindergarten who meet in a portable attached to the shul, and the need for space is obvious, the rabbi says.

He stresses that the Hebrew school not only serves children, but also has extensive programs for adults to satisfy a variety of interests. Such classes include Hebrew literary courses in both modern and siddur Hebrew and sometimes the aleph bet; a Lunch and Learn program to discuss the weekly Torah portion; Exploring Judaism, covering Jewish history, Jewish living and philosophy; and a chaverim program for the many seniors in the area.

Rabbi Reinstein says Jewish education has always been part of the congregational program. Rabbis were hired with the stipulation that they would also teach the children. When Rabbi Reinstein came to Victoria in 1982, the Hebrew school classes were being held above a local apparel store. There were 15 students, he recalls, and three teachers, including himself.

The rabbi felt strongly that the school should be moved to the shul to give young people "a direct sense of emotional attachment. I wanted them to know it was their shul as well as their parents'. It's important for them to have a direct relationship with the synagogue."

He sees the synagogue as the heart of the community, where all who attend are part of the mishpocha. "Through the children, the families connect with the community," he says.

Besides moving the school to the shul, the rabbi created a new framework, starting from Grade 3. Optional attendance two or three times a week was changed to compulsory three times a week classes — two afternoons and Sunday morning, for a total of six hours. Where there had been no specific curriculum, Rabbi Reinstein established one, based on that of the Melton Institute and other Conservative sources.

All bnei mitzvah students are required to attend services and become familiar with prayer procedures for a year before their 13th birthday. Students must be able to read Hebrew. Those who can't are taught through an outreach program, especially up-Islanders outside the city.

The rabbi says some children have to be driven four or five hours to get to the bar and bat mitzvah class on Sundays.

When children who need special attention can read Hebrew, they can prepare for the bar or bat mitzvah, which may take place after age 13.

With the growth of the school, the rabbi has turned over the principal's job, and the school program is under the supervision of an educational committee co-chaired by Sutker and Lindy Shortt. Teachers are recruited from among former students and adults with Judaic training, including several Israelis living here.

To encourage total community participation, the rabbi has organized well-attended Shabbat dinners, at which families get instruction on how to make Shabbat at home. Frequent services are held where families daven together.

Bnei mitzvah students learn more than just a maftir. The rabbi says they are prepared to participate in shul life and to understand what it means to be part of a community as adults.

As for older members, "many come to this beautiful area to leave a Jewish life," the rabbi comments. But they usually have a spiritual hunger which brings them back to active Judaism through the synagogue. Often it's a single event, like a death in the family, that brings them to shul to say Kaddish.

The new three-storey building will have a roof garden a playground, eight classrooms, kitchens, a board room, a meeting room for major events and an office for the rabbi. If feasible, there will be a mikvah.

The schools' budget for the coming year is $51,400. Students pay $700 per year and the balance comes out of shul dues. Students conduct various fundraising programs, including operating the synagogue gift shop. In all, the school is more than 60 per cent self-financing.

Man who escaped Auschwitz lives unsung, largely ignored

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A hero of the Holocaust, Ceslav Mordowicz, was recently presented with an honorary degree by Union College in Schenectady, N.Y. But he lives quietly in Toronto, unsung and largely ignored.

Mordowicz, 76, escaped from Auschwitz May 27, 1944, to tell an unbelieving world the truth of what was happening there. He is credited, along with three other brave escapees, of saving 200,000 Hungarian Jews from deportation.

On April 30 this year, Holocaust historian Prof. Stephen Berk of Union College, who frequently mentions Mordowicz in his lectures, was giving a talk at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. A woman asked him: "Do you know that the man sitting next to me is Mr. Mordowicz?"

"The entire congregation was stunned," Berk told the Wall Street Journal. "It was like someone stepped out of a history book."

For his part, Mordowicz is bemused by the adulation poured on him at Union College, and the VIPs including U.S. Senator Patrick Moynihan who wanted to shake his hand, in contrast to the obscurity of his life in Toronto.

He came here 10 years ago from Israel because his daughter, Dagmar Wertheim, an architect, lives in Toronto.

"I escaped from Auschwitz not to save my life but to tell the world what was happening at Auschwitz, the big secret the Nazis were trying to hide," said Mordowicz.

Several official sources acknowledge Mordowicz' role as a hero. One is Martin Gilbert's The Holocaust, which includes a map of the route Mordowicz and his fellow escapee, Arnost Rosin, followed to reach Slovakia. Through the Jews there, they told their story to people in the United States, England, the Vatican, Switzerland, Sweden and at the International Red Cross.

As a result of these reports, sufficient public pressure was brought on Hungary that its deportations of Jews stopped in July 1944.

Before Mordowicz escaped Auschwitz, he saw the first Hungarian Jewish deportees put to death in the ovens at Birkenau.

The map in Gilbert's book was reproduced as well in The Voice of Auschwitz Survivors in Israel, along with pictures of Mordowicz, Rosin and two other Auschwitz escapees, Rudolf Rosenberg (Vrba) and Alfred Weltzer. The caption under the illustration states: "This most effective act by the Auschwitz resistance movement contributed to the rescue of more than 200,000 Hungarian Jews."

One of Mordowicz's proudest possessions is a certificate bestowing honorary membership in Lapid Israel, the movement for transmitting the lessons of the Holocaust, "in recognition of his heroic escape, which made the truth about Auschwitz known worldwide for the first time."

The certificate adds: "Lapid shall always remember this courageous example, which has proven that, sometimes, what seems impossible, is indeed possible."

Mordowicz, a native of Mlawa, Poland, lost his parents and his sister in the Holocaust. After his escape from Auschwitz, he fought in the Resistance, was recaptured, and sent to the death camp again.

"He's probably the only person who ever survived Auschwitz twice," said Berk.

After the war, Mordowicz worked as a manager in an electrical parts factory in Slovakia before immigrating to Israel in 1965.

Following his escape to Slovakia, Mordowicz gave his critical testimony on June 20, 1944, in the Vatican office at the Suaty Jur monastery near Gratislava.

The meeting with Msgr. Josef Gurzio, the papal nuncio, lasted six hours. "It was a very difficult mission to persuade him of the horrors of Auschwitz," said Mordowicz. The Vatican petitioned Hungary to stop the deportations and enlisted the help of the Allies to add pressure.

Today he is amazed that not one of the many thousands of Hungarian Jews living in Toronto has sought him out.

The Jewish community in Guayaquil, Ecuador

By ABRAHAM ARNOLD

On the first Friday in February, I chanted Lecha Dodi at the Sabbath eve service of the Communidad de Culto Israelita, at the Guayaquil Jewish Centre in Ecuador.

There are just 20 Jewish families, not more than 100 people, now living in Guayaquil's largest city, which has some two million people. Yet the Communidad Israelita Jewish Centre has a swimming pool and tennis court, as well as the sanctuary, classrooms and social hall. How did they achieve this type of centre?

The answer must begin with the history of the Jews in Ecuador, where the Jews first arrived in some numbers in the late 1930s as refugees from Germany and German-occupied countries. The Ecuador Jewish community, including an estimated 1,000 in Quito, thus began as a Holocaust escape centre.

Ecuador was one of the few countries which admitted Jewish refugees from Germany after the rise of Hitler. Some bought their way into the country; others said they were farmers even if they were lawyers or economists.

My wife, Bertha Arnold, served in Guayaquil as Canadian Executive Service Organization volunteer adviser with Fundacion Natura, a non-government environment protection organization, helping them plan membership and fundraising campaigns.

In Guayaquil we soon learned that the contact person for the Jewish Community was Johnny Czarninski, honorary consul of Israel and president of the Communidad Israelita. He is also the head of Mi Commissariato, Ecuador's largest supermarket chain.

We met Czarninski in his nondescript office, next door to his downtown supermarket, which doubles as the "consulate." The only visible evidence of this status was a road barrier reading Consulat de Israel on the street in front of the building.

The 40-ish honorary consul was born in Ecuador and educated abroad. He speaks Hebrew as well as Spanish and English. He told us his grandfather, Jacob Czarninski from East Prussia was among the 1939 arrivals and one of the founders of the Jewish community. His grandfather's name was also the second one on the En Memoria (Yizkor memorial) tablet in the synagogue sanctuary.

Guayaquil was a harsh and swampy place in the late '30s and early '40s, with malaria and yellow fever prevalent. The Jews arrived there because it was a port city with economic opportunities.

Several hundred Jews stayed and started the synagogue and centre, maintained in a rented apartment for many years. During World War II, 400 to 500 Jews lived in Guayaquil. Some soon began to leave for Quito, the capital, and later for the United States and Canada, until the number of Jews was reduced to the present level.

About a dozen years ago, the remaining families in Guayaquil decided to build their own Jewish centre. Probably none were more determined to see the centre built than the Czarninski family who became its main benefactors.

The Guayaquil Jewish Centre is not visible from the street; it is protected by a high wall and several armed guards. (Armed guards are not unusual in Guayaquil at banks and other buildings. More affluent residences are also well-protected.)

Despite the fact that it was the height of the hot and rainy season and some people were away on vacation, the congregation still mustered a minyan of a dozen men (I was the 13th). It was a quasi-Orthodox service with the men sitting on one side and the women on the other; there was no mechitzah. Only one woman was present alongside my wife.

Jaime (Chaim) Grubel, 26, of Quito (now living in Guayaquil), conducted the service. The congregation used a Hebrew-Spanish siddur published in Buenos Aires, which has an introduction by the late Rabbi Marshall T. Mayer of the United States, who served in Argentina for many years. The baal tefillah used a smaller paperback prayer book, which we later learned was the Oraciones Para el Kabalat Shabat (Siddur Kabbalat Shabbat) published by the Associacion Israelita de Quito.

Before the service, we met several congregation members, including Erwin Hess and Helmut Wellisch of the 1939 arrivals, and Jack and Victor Ezkenazi who in 1973, came from Lima and Buenos Aires respectively. Hess spoke Yiddish and Wellisch spoke English.

The next day we spent a pleasant afternoon with Helmut Wellisch and his wife, the Quito-born former Eva Steiner; she is the vice-president of the Guayaquil Jewish Centre.

Helmut was 7 years old when he arrived in Guayaquil with his family in the spring of 1939. His father, with a PhD in economics, had been the investment director of a bank in Dresden.

L' Shana Tovah

Johnny Czarninski, honorary consul of Israel and president of the Guayaquil Jewish community, at the Aron Kodesh of the local synagogue.

Still mustering a minyan

In 1933, a Nazi-government edict was issued to the banks to dismiss all their Jewish employees. The manager of the bank where Helmut's father worked read the edict to his staff with tears in his eyes. On being dismissed from his post he was able to work as an independent investment adviser until 1938 and continued to do some work for his former employer.

However Helmut's father and uncle knew they would have to leave the country. They heard it was possibile to settle in Ecuador as farmers and enrolled in a HIAS school in Berlin, still functioning before 1938, which taught farming and carpentry. This helped them to obtain a visa for Ecuador.

After reaching Ecuador with their families, the Wellisch brothers rented a farm near Quito and lived and worked there together until 1942. They then concluded the farm could not support seven people in their two families. On a roll of the dice, Helmut's father left for the city to start a business.

His uncle stayed on the farm, where he and his wife started a restaurant and later a guest house, which grew into a hotel. Eventually that branch of the family established the Colon Hotel, one of the leading hotels in Quito today, though it is no longer Jewish-owned.

Helmut and Eva Wellisch have been part of the core-group of a dozen Jewish families in Guayaquil for a considerable number of years. They have helped maintain Jewish study classes for the children and a Maccabi youth group, of which their two sons, now 29 and 25, were among the founders.

Jews do not feel threatened

Eva said all the best elementary and high schools are run by the church and by private organizations. When choosing a school for their sons, they followed the example of most other Jewish families who were sending their children to the German-backed school, which had one of the best programs.

They experienced virtually no difficulties as Jews at the German school. In fact while their sons were students, Eva served for a time as the secretary of the school board. And one of their sons was elected president of the student body in 1985.

One student did make an anti-Jewish remark during the election campaign when the Wellisch son was a candidate. The principal called the student body together and announced that the author of that remark would be expelled if his name became known. Young Wellisch, the candidate, knew who it was, but said nothing.

While there may be occasional anti-Jewish encounters, the Jews of Guayaquil and Quito do not feel threatened, I was told.

Searching for a shul, the soldier finds a life-long friend

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On erev Rosh Hashanah 1945, a young Canadian soldier wandered through the streets of Nijmegen, Holland looking for the shul. His search for the synagogue led to a loving friendship which he says has grown over the past 50 years.

Murray Schwartz of Toronto recalls that night vividly and with gratitude. Recently, Murray and his wife Esther celebrated their 50th year of friendship in Israel with the family that befriended him on his way to High Holy Day services.

Murray had enlisted in an infantry regiment, the Queens Own Rifles in 1941 when he was 23 years old. After eight months of training, he was shipped out to England where he refused a commission to officer training. He fought in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany and was sent back to Holland.

His commanding officer had given him directions to the synagogue. Unable to find the building, the young soldier came upon a man wearing a black silk top hat and black morning suit with striped pants. Murray asked him, "Are you going to shul?" The man beckoned Murray to come along with him.

The shul had been badly damaged by bombings and the German's had been billeted there. Murray recalls that they were just finishing the cleanup and repairs. When the services were over, the man asked if Murray would like to join his family for dinner.

His visit that night with the Jakobs family was the first of many and the beginning of his lifelong friendship with the Jakobs and their teenage daughter, Edith. The Jakobs' home became Murray's home away from home and Murray and Edith developed a special friendship.

Ben and Edith Samuel (left) with Esther and Murray Schwartz at a reunion in Israel.

Murray learned that the Jakobs had recently lost their young daughter.

The Jakobs had come out of hiding when Holland was liberated on May 5, 1945. They had immigrated to Holland from Germany in 1938. In 1940, Germany invaded Holland. When they received notification in August 1942 that all German Jews were to report to a camp, Edith's father realizing the gravity of the situation made arrangements with a local farmer to hide his family in the farmer's hay loft.

Tragically, the barn burnt down in 1944 and the Jakobs had to flee. Amid fierce fighting, Edith's 19-year-old sister, Rose, was killed when she stepped on a land mine. Murray, who began to attend services regularly, was able to comfort the family. On his return to Canada, he began corresponding with Edith.

In 1948, when Murray and Esther were married, Esther took over the correspondence. Edith married Ben Samuel the following year. Through the mail, they shared stories and photos of their individual families — the Samuels have seven children and the Schwartz have four children.

The Samuels made aliyah in 1969. For their 25th anniversary in 1973, Murray and Esther had their first reunion with the Samuels in Israel.

"We had fears and apprehension that we may not hit it off in person," says Esther. "But, Edith and I became bonded together like sisters and Murray and Ben like brothers. In fact, when we returned to Toronto, our letters became even warmer and more personal."

During the Yom Kippur War, Esther and two of her children went to Israel to show solidarity with the Samuels whose two sons were in the army. And six years ago, Robbie, Esther and Murray's son who made aliyah 12 years ago, was seriously injured by a rock thrown at him while serving in the IDF on the West Bank.

"El Al flew us over to Israel," says Murray. "Edith and Ben were right there for us — offering their help and support." He notes that Robbie has fully recovered and works in education. He is completing his doctorate degree in political science and economics in Jerusalem.

Over the years, there have been many visits to the Samuels, and the Samuels have visited Toronto. When Esther entered an international contest for culinary arts in Jerusalem, where she won a bronze medal, Edith was there to assist her.

The Samuels now live in Jerusalem where Edith works as a handicraft teacher and Ben is an agricultural advisor. As well, he coordinates Keren Klita for new immigrants in his neighborhood.

Murray has retired from the textile business and has pursued his hobby as a sculptor. Esther is the kosher food consultant for the Kashruth Council of Toronto.

Now proud grandparents — the Samuels have 35 grandchildren and one great-grandchild and the Schwartz have seven grandchildren — they are pleased that their children have continued the friendship between the two families.

Murray told The CJN that "the only good thing that came out of the war, was this remarkable friendship that has spanned the continents and the generations."

L' Shana Tovah

In Mozambique, a mere handful of worshippers

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MAPUTO, Mozambique — Images of erect men and women — shoulders square to the camera, broad hats to shield the blazing African sun — rise out of the faded Aug. 29, 1926, photo.

The blurred figures are clear enough to show the pride in the faces of the 35 people standing on the steps of their tiny synagogue on the date of its consecration.

Now, 69 years later, six worshippers huddle in a circle below the leaky, termite-infested roof of Mozambique's only synagogue.

Above them is the Star of David, its rich stained glass long ago shattered, replaced by a patchwork of faded colors.

Despite the dire condition of Maputo's synagogue, the tiny Jewish community here is experiencing a recovery.

"Things are much better now than before 1989," when the government returned the synagogue to the community, says Christa Lien, 54, a Maputo housewife who has been instrumental in finding support for renovating the synagogue.

A socialist, one-party state in southwestern Africa the size of Texas, most of Mozambique's 15 million people hold indigenous religious beliefs, including those of the Bantu tribes. About one-third are Christian.

When the country achieved independence from Portugal in 1975, the government took over the tiny whitewashed shul and turned it into a warehouse. Almost all private property was nationalized following independence.

Many members of the Jewish community say that when the synagogue was finally returned to the community in 1989, it was in a terrible state of repair and all the furniture had been taken.

The Jewish cemetery, which is more than 100 years old, was also in bad shape in 1989.

"There were heaps of garbage piled everywhere in the cemetery," says Lien. "One Dutch Jew who was here with the embassy started working there on the weekends, and after a while other people started helping and got it cleaned up."

Now, Jewish activists here are hoping that continued stability, brought about by the end of Mozambique's 16-year-long civil war, and by last October's multiparty elections, will bring back the days when the community flourished.

In the 1940s, the Jewish population swelled in Maputo, the country's capital, which was known then as Lourenco Marques.

Refugees fleeing Hitler's Europe were looking for safety anywhere, and because Lorenco Marques was a neutral port, many landed there.

By 1942, some 500 Jews were living in the city.

Job Chambal, the director of religious affairs for the Mozambican Ministry of Justice says there are six to eight Mozambican Jews here today. There are another 20 to 30 in the expatriate community.

"The community here was very weak from around 1960 on," he adds. "They would have services there on high holidays and that was about it.

The synagogue continued to be used by the community until the country's independence.

After 1989, the synagogue was used only for important holidays.

But, since April 1993, services have been held there without fail every Friday night.

Members of the community are now turning their attention to making desperately needed repairs to the structure. The roof has deteriorated so badly that some fear its collapse.

Estimates for repairing the roof alone run close to $30,000.

Community members intend to seek assistance from some of the larger Jewish communities in the region. They planned to appeal for funding at last month's African-Jewish Congress in Johannesburg.

Until the repairs are completed, services will continue in the tiny synagogue located just off July 24 Avenue.

However small the crowd, the synagogue is of vital importance to the Jewish community of Maputo, for it is the only exposure members are likely to have to Judaism.

"I have always known I was Jewish, but never practiced Judaism," says 22-year-old Victor Sousa, the only Mozambican who attended services on a recent Friday.

Earlier this year, CJN reporter Ron Csillag visited Jamaica, courtesy of the Jamaica Tourist Board and Air Canada.

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Never mind the sunny skies, 30-degree winter weather and rum punches that can leave one grinning for hours. For the Jewish visitor, Jamaica represents the complete antithesis of the trips through the sites of Europe's death camps.

For here, one encounters quite possibly the most philo-Semitic people on Earth; a Jewish community that, although waning, fascinates; strong pro-Israel sentiments; and a synagogue that can charm the most jaded traveller.

Yes, there are Jews in Jamaica — roughly 250 souls — mainly in the capital, but also in Montego Bay and Ocho Rios.

Kingston's old age home has 10 Jewish residents who receive regular visits from community leaders. And scattered in at least 15 different places are the remains of Jewish gravestones from the 17th and 18th centuries, many of which have been moved into the grassy courtyard of the synagogue in Kingston.

The Jews of Jamaica trace their lineage to the Spanish Inquisition and its resulting Marranos (secret Jews). It's believed the first Jews fled Spain and Portugal to the island in 1494 and practised their faith clandestinely.

That explains the fine, white sand strewn on the creaky wood floors of Kingston's synagogue, the United Congregation of Israelites. It reminds modern-day worshipers that Jamaica's Marranos used sand in their synagogues to muffle the sound of their prayers.

The secret Jews came into the open after the British conquest in 1655 (the year marking the community's official establishment) and the first synagogue was built in Port Royal shortly afterward. Jews rented land from the British and went into the sugar business.

By 1735, there were 800 Jews on Jamaica, a number that would swell to 2,500, mainly Sephardim,

[Cont'd. on page B 41]

Community leader Ernest de Souza (right) with fellow congregants. Dark-skinned Jamaican Jews are converts.

Jews of Jamaica

by 1880.

Jamaican Jews proudly point to two watershed historical events: in 1699, a letter from Britain's Commissioner of Trade advised His Majesty "to direct the Governor of Jamaica to treat the Jews gently, and that they not be obliged to be in arms on their Sabbath or other solemn feasts, unless it be when an enemy is in view."

In 1849, the island's House of Assembly adjourned for Yom Kippur, in deference to its eight Jewish members.

The island's Sephardi and Ashkenazi congregations finally merged in 1921 into a curious blend of both, along religious lines which today are Conservative and egalitarian. Kingston's synagogue, a gleaming white structure on Duke Street near more modest Baptist and Pentecostal churches, was dedicated in 1888. Its ceiling fans are welcome.

Today, Jews claim to be the island's second oldest permanent residents after the Spaniards, and boast of a rare sense of security, comfort and acceptance. Jamaica is a religious Christian society, but many view Jews (or Israelites, as they are called) as God's chosen people because the Bible says so.

Jewish surnames resonate with Jamaican history: de Souza, Henriques, Matalon, Ashenheim. The Myers still control their eponymous rum business. Eli Matalon was a senator and mayor of Kingston, while Sir Neville Ashenheim served as Jamaica's ambassador to the United States. Many Jews, however, fled during the political turmoil of the 1970s.

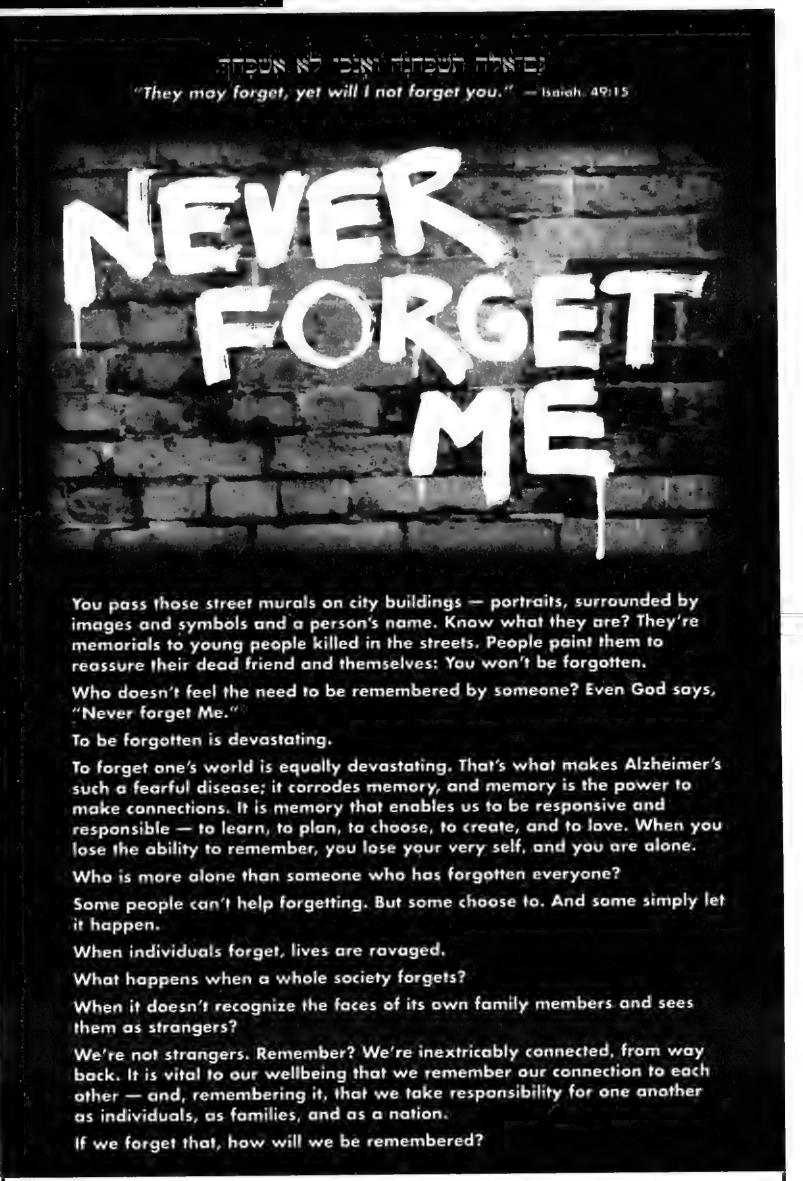
There is no permanent rabbi. It is the renowned Ernest de Souza, a retired photographer, who has been the spiritual and community leader for over 40 years. He leads synagogue services, visits the sick and elderly, presides over life cycle events and makes sure matzot and kosher foods are imported for Passover. Asked about anti-Semitism, de Souza says, "There's none at all."

(In awarding The CJN reporter an aliyah at Shabbat services, he whispers, "We're Sephardi, so just say what you like.")

A year ago, "Reverend" de Souza, as so many Jamaicans know him, was made a Commander of the Order of Distinction.

While de Souza rues that the community is mainly non-observant, aging and shrinking, he adds quickly, "We've been here for 500 years, and we'll be here for another 500."

A shop sign in Negril. Asked about the Star of David, the owner said, "I like Jews, man." Apparently, many Jamaicans feel likewise. [Ron Csillag photos]



You pass those street murals on city buildings — portraits, surrounded by images and symbols and a person's name. Know what they are? They're memorials to young people killed in the streets. People paint them to reassure their dead friend and themselves: You won't be forgotten.

Who doesn't feel the need to be remembered by someone? Even God says, "Never forget Me."

To be forgotten is devastating.

To forget one's world is equally devastating. That's what makes Alzheimer's such a fearful disease; it corrodes memory, and memory is the power to make connections. It is memory that enables us to be responsive and responsible — to learn, to plan, to choose, to create, and to love. When you lose the ability to remember, you lose your very self, and you are alone.

Who is more alone than someone who has forgotten everyone?

Some people can't help forgetting. But some choose to. And some simply let it happen.

When individuals forget, lives are ravaged.

What happens when a whole society forgets?

When it doesn't recognize the faces of its own family members and sees them as strangers?

We're not strangers. Remember? We're inextricably connected, from way back. It is vital to our wellbeing that we remember our connection to each other — and, remembering it, that we take responsibility for one another as individuals, as families, and as a nation.

If we forget that, how will we be remembered?

*Isaiah 44:21

Rosh Hashanah is known as the Day of Memory.
May we all be remembered for a good year, and may we remember.

A recently-arrived Chechen family

Chechens at home, feeling safe in Israel

By GAIL LICHTMAN

In the pictures taken at Ben-Gurion Airport in December, they looked like an ordinary family of new immigrants — a father weary from the long plane ride holding a little boy engrossed in his first chocolate bar.

But only a few weeks before, this same Jewish family, preparing to leave Chechnya for Israel, stood in their Grozny home while Chechen soldiers held a gun to the boy's head and threatened to kill him if his parents tried to leave the country with any of their possessions.

"They didn't want us to take money or anything," recalls Dimitri Bibijiev. "We couldn't even take our diplomas or passports — only our birth certificates. We fled with nothing."

Bibijiev, his wife Kobler and their son are three of more than 100 Chechen Jewish refugees brought out of the war zone to new lives in Israel by the Jewish Agency for Israel emissaries. The Jewish Agency receives most of its funds from the annual United Jewish Appeal Federation campaign.

An additional 200 traumatized refugees remain in Russia under Jewish Agency care awaiting permission to leave from the Russian authorities. Some have lost family members in the fighting and bombings that leveled the Jewish quarter of Grozny.

The Bibijievs, along with six other Chechen Jewish families, have settled in Mitzpe Rimon, a development town of 6,000 in the central Negev.

"All the Chechans in Mitzpe Rimon are traumatized," says Galina Guzin, the town's absorption coordinator, herself an immigrant who came from Minsk to Israel in 1990. "They need a warm, caring place to settle in. We hope Mitzpe Rimon will be this place."

Since the start of the unprecedented immigration in 1989, Mitzpe Rimon has absorbed large numbers of new immigrants from the former Soviet Union. Today, nearly 2,000 of the town's citizens are Russian immigrants and they are playing an important role in transforming Mitzpe Rimon, once considered a stagnant town, into a growing community.

Nevertheless, the Chechens are finding their beginnings in Mitzpe Rimon difficult.

"I didn't have to go through what they did to come to Israel," says Guzin. "In addition to the normal absorption crisis, they have this burden. They had to leave everything behind and they are still suffering from the shock of having their homes and their community destroyed. They arrived with only the clothes on their backs. Theirs is not an easy absorption."

The six Chechen families, all interrelated, are Caucasus Mountain Jews who, despite 74 years of Communist rule, preserved their centuries-old community and customs — until the war.

Remarkable museum celebrates 30th anniversary

By LILI EYLON
Jerusalem Dateline

One of the 20 largest museums in the world, in terms of scope, activities and number of visitors, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem is celebrating its 30th birthday.

It all began in 1906 with the rich collection of Jewish ceremonial art begun by professors Boris Schatz and Mordechai Narkiss. That collection became the nucleus of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem when it opened in 1965.

Today it is a sprawling complex of buildings, housing an opulence of art objects from all corners of the earth. It also includes the beautiful outdoor Billy Rose Sculpture Garden, filled with works by Maillol, Moore, Picasso and many others.

Museum director Martin Weyl says that from its very inception, the museum's guidelines have been the same: an insistence on universal standards of quality matching the best museums in the world in the areas of collecting, research, preservation, exhibition, publications and education.

Visitors to the museum fall into three categories. The tourists, who generally tour the Shrine of the Book which houses the Dead Sea Scrolls, the archeology section and the Judaica collection.

Israelis from all over the country who usually tour the larger special exhibitions; and Jerusalemites for whom the museum serves not only as a national gallery, but also as a regional and municipal museum and who require a faster pace of changing exhibits.

"The result is that there are some eight to nine exhibitions shown simultaneously, with new ones constantly being planned," Weyl says.

The Ruth Youth Wing, a separate building which is always bustling with children, is the museum's particular point of pride.

Changing exhibitions, a library well-stocked with storybooks from many lands and in several languages, various workshops, including a recycling workshop, occasional concerts and contests keep preschool and school-age youngsters creatively busy.

Asked to characterize the Israel Museum, the director replied unhesitatingly: "The museum is remarkable for its diversity. It is not just a Jewish museum, or an archeological museum, but also a museum of classical and contemporary art. We have a strong local input combined with windows to the world."

Israel becoming world player in CD-ROM production

World Zionist Press Service

It's a new game in the computer world, but Israel is already a super player. Just over three years ago, most Israelis had never heard the terms CD-ROM, edutainment, or interactive computer experiences. By 1994, Israeli graphics and multi-media firms were already bringing in $10 million in annual CD-ROM export revenues, and predictions for 1995 set revenues at $50 million.

CD-ROM (which stands for Compact Disc-Read Only Memory, meaning that you can access data on the disc but cannot store new information on it) combines sound, stills, video clips, film footage, animation and text to create new types of learning and entertainment. Users can go anywhere they want in the program and select anything they want to see, thus actively managing their own "edutainment."

These new interactive experiences have been made possible by the discovery of additional uses for compact discs, originally thought of as mere technological improvements over audio records and tapes. A standard CD contains 640 megabytes, which is equal to hundreds and thousands of pages of texts. In the past few years, this tremendous capacity to store digital data has been harnessed to produce programs that present information in complete and fascinating combinations of visual and audio representations.

Among the new crop of Israelis capitalizing on the CD's potential are brothers Robert and Jeffrey Rosenschein. When they first started their small computer company in Jerusalem 12 years ago, they could never have imagined that by 1995 it would become Accent Software International Ltd., an international software company employing some 90 people.

How has Israel become such a booming centre for CD-ROM production? Robert Rosenschein, now president and chief executive officer of Accent, presents several possible explanations.

"First of all, computer creativity does not require high capital investment. It really can be done by a couple of bright people in a garage or a loft. Also, Israel has a rich pool of cultural backgrounds, which spawns internationally marketable creativity. The country is such a polyglot of languages and cultures that we almost instinctively know how to universalize and globalize software and programs," he says.

Accent is about to market a CD-ROM version of their stunningly successful multilingual word processing program which includes a unique "global alphabet."

Although no statistics are available, multi-media companies are mushrooming throughout Israel, especially in Jerusalem. Many employ olim (new immigrants). "As olim, we have had to adapt to another culture," says American-born Dina Porat, manager of Glyph, a 1½-year-old multi-media company located in Jerusalem. "Maybe that's why, as professionals, so many olim understand what it means to adapt our products to different cultures," she says, echoing Rosenschein's sentiments.

But there is no doubt that the vision, guts and sheer chutzpa — for which Israel is renowned — have also made their considerable contribution.

Glyph will soon be marketing Jerusalem 3000 — its first CD-ROM program — which describes Jerusalem's history, traditions and cultures from biblical times to the present in text, music, film, videos and still photos. Aimed at all three major religions, the program is the brainchild of another new immigrant, Russian born Damien Kudriaytsev.

"We're using CD technology to show people how the city looks and feels," says Porat. "They'll almost be able to smell it."

Superstudio, also located in Jerusalem, employs over 65 people, most of them immigrants from the United States, and competes successfully in the international market. It has produced the award winning Knowledge Enrichment CD-ROM, and Leonardo the Inventor, which used 3-D animation to bring sketches from the inventor's notebook to life.

A beit midrash unlike any other

By EMILY L. HAUSER

It's a beit midrash (house of religious study) unlike any other: observant Jews and believing Muslims sit around tables in small groups and, led by learned scholars from both faiths, study the Torah and the Koran. Together.

The arguments put forward for a continuation of the warfare between Jews and Arabs in the Middle East are often religious, based in the parallel but all too different Muslim and Jewish faiths. Rather than give in to that difference, however, a group of religious leaders has joined forces to study it.

"It is our fate to live here together," says Dr. Mithkal Natour, professor of Islamic law at the Islamic College in the Israeli-Arab town of Baka al-Garbiya (42 miles northwest of Jerusalem), and one of those leading the beit midrash. "We can do it in a state of daily warfare, or we can do it out of understanding and mutual respect. [In this program] we have decided to bring out the points on which we agree and to put aside the points of difference for now."

The study sessions are sponsored by the Yakar Synagogue and Study Centre in Jerusalem. Students and teachers from the Islamic College arrive in buses, make themselves coffee, sit down over the evening's chosen text, hash it out with their counterparts from Yakar and then listen to lectures by one of the Jewish scholars and one of the Muslims. There are questions and lively discussion, but participants report that an effort is made on all sides to keep the arguments friendly and respectful.

One evening this summer, some of the issues were easier than others. Did Abraham/Ibrahim almost sacrifice Isaac, or, as Islam teaches, Ishmael? Sources are found, quoted and discussed, but the matter is left open, almost as if it is enough that the stories are so similar.

The question of whether a man has the right to punish a disrespectful wife doesn't go as smoothly, however. The Jews are visibly uncomfortable with the Islamic approach, which allows for withholding sexual relations and even beatings if a woman refuses to obey her husband.

Natour, a friendly, eloquent 59-year-old who looks younger than his years, responds to the discomfort by saying: "We have a problem with the way that progress has flooded us, in particular because of the Jewish community. However, we still are not like you. In our community, those who call themselves feminists — excuse me for saying this — they are outcasts."

The reactions of the Jewish students are restrained, though. "There is a feeling of 'What, are we going to yell at them because of their attitude toward women?' " a Jewish participant told the Hebrew weekly Kol Hair. "The project is barely just beginning, and there's a feeling that they're doing us a favor by coming." Moreover, he says, the point is to get to know each other, not to score conversions.

Yakar was first established in England in 1978 by Rabbi Mickey Rosen, who brought it to Israel in 1992.

The Muslim-Jewish study program was launched just before last Passover, funded by the Barbra Streisand Foundation. The project is currently on hold until after the High Holy Days, as money has temporarily run out. When classes resume, Rabbi Rosen intends to bus the Jewish participants out to Baka al-Garbiya, too. "Psychologically, it's important that they also host us."

Referring to the peace process, he says, "You can't turn a history of enmity around by making a political decision. You de-humanize people if you make a merely political decision ... I think that the real influence we can have is a psychological one — seeing the other person as a real person, rather than a concept."

Rabbi Rosen says he was told by a number of Jewish Israelis that he would not be able to find any religious Muslims willing to join him on the project — "that maybe I'd find one secular guy." To his surprise, he found a number of highly-placed Muslim religious leaders who wanted to be involved, including Natour, the qadi (Islamic religious judge) of Jerusalem, and the president of the Islamic College.

In fact, the head of the Israeli Islamic Movement, Shiekh Abdullah Nimir Darwish, is particularly supportive of Yakar's program. "In the Middle East, and I say that on purpose, not just in Israel but in the Middle East, such studies will move things forward well. And then maybe, maybe, maybe, we'll know once and for all that it is possible to live together, even if there are many different beliefs ... I don't expect [Jews] to believe in my book, but I do expect them to respect it."

The Jewish community has not been as unfailingly supportive.

No Jews have actively opposed the project, Rabbi Rosen says, "but there's a feeling that this isn't unzere — it's not the sort of thing we do. 'That Rabbi Rosen, he's English, he's an outsider.' "

Natour sees this hesitation as part of a general misunderstanding that the West has of Islam. "If 50 out of 500 Jews are extremists, should I think that all Jews are like that? Not everyone who says that he acts for Islam is a real Muslim ... We are trying to bring out the truth of Islam."

Rabbi Rosen also expresses a religious goal, referring to the concept of tikkun olam (perfection of the world under the rule of God). Observant Jews take on the obligation of tikkun olam three times a day in their regular prayers, and the idea is Rabbi Rosen's guiding principle.

"Tikkun olam is to accept the other as a legitimate equal," he says. "My experience over the last 20 years tells me that this method of intimate learning leads people to be able to see the other as an equal partner, a person of integrity ... That's real tikkun olam."

Rebbetzin Esther Batiste supervises recent Russian olim in the packaging and distribution of free meals to needy families.

'Dew of Life' nurtures needy

By EDGAR ASHER
Isranet

In Petach Tikvah and Rosh Ha'ayin, Rabbi Meir Batiste and his wife Esther are familiar and well-known by both the religious and secular communities. Even those who may not recognize them by sight know their names, as they have become synonymous with the true spirit of hitnadvut (volunteerism).

The Batistes have for many years dedicated themselves to helping in the community, in particular the new immigrants from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. They do not just organize, but are an integral part of every venture in which they are associated.

Their organization, Tal Chaim (The Dew of Life), has been recognized for its contribution to the improvement of the standard of life of needy Israelis. Tal Chaim recently received the prestigious President's Award for Volunteerism 1995.

Tal Chaim was established three years ago when it was recognized that there are many needy people who in some cases do not have the ability to earn sufficient money to maintain themselves and their families.

In the late '80s, one of the main problems was that many Russians and Ethiopians were not getting enough to cut. This was particularly serious when it came to the children of such families. Another sector in need of assistance was the elderly.

The Batistes realized that there was a substantial pool of new immigrants who could be encouraged to participate in volunteer work and community assistance. From this seed grew Tal Chaim.

Today about 150 volunteers, 75 per cent of them new immigrants who have come to Israel in the past three years, assist in the preparation of meals. Each week Tal Chaim volunteers prepare over 2,500 meals that are distributed — again by volunteers — to about 600 individuals in Petach Tikva and Rosh Ha'ayin.

In addition to ensuring that everybody has a nutritious meal, several times a week the centre offers Hebrew classes, guidance and practical assistance in absorption, cultural activities, seminars and Shabbat hospitality, legal consultations and youth activities.

Many of the older Russian immigrants, who came to Israel before the establishment of the CIS, have received help from Tal Chaim. They have commented on the moral support and affection that has come from the organizers, which is every bit as important as a square meal.

Tal Chaim is run on a very small budget of less than $14,000 per year. Being a volunteer organization it depends on the generosity of food manufacturers as well as the goodwill of its volunteers.

The Batistes hope that the Tel Chaim concept of giving, with the extensive use of immigrant volunteers, will become a model for other communities in Israel.

El Al set to fly into private sector

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

To Jews around the world, the words El Al are synonymous with Jewish pride and Israeli ingenuity. The Israeli airline's blue and white fleet unabashedly flies the Star of David on its wings and steadfastly refuses to operate on Shabbat.

But El Al's days as a government owned enterprise will soon come to an end.

Determined to promote privatization as a whole, and thereby create a more competitive free-market economy, the Israeli government plans to sell 51 per cent of the airline, possibly by the end of the year.

"Privatization is one of the most important steps the government can take to improve the country's financial market," said Eitan Shapir, director of the Finance Ministry's privatization department.

During the past decade, the government has gradually sold off many of its largest institutions — with good results.

Some companies, such as the Israel Shipyard, were losing millions of dollars and the government was able to cut its losses. Others, such as Israel Chemicals, were sold at a profit.

How going private will affect El Al is far from certain. In 1994, as a government-owned company, the airline scored a healthy $14 million in profits on more than $1 billion in revenues, according to official figures.

This year's profits are expected to total between $10 million and $14 million, with $1.5 billion in revenues.

During the past five years, in a bid to become more competitive with other airlines, the national carrier has expanded its operations and improved its services.

According to El Al spokesperson Nachman Kleinman, the airline flew to fewer than 40 destinations in 1990. This year, the company expects to fly about 2.6 million passengers to 51 destinations.

El Al entered the Far East, the fastest growing airline market, in December 1992, with weekly flights to Beijing. It also expanded service to Hong Kong; New Delhi; Bombay, India; Bangkok, Thailand; and Seoul, South Korea. A much-awaited link to Japan will get under way as soon as the Japanese government approves the venture.

Other factors have also played a role in El Al's recent success. One is the company's realization that it cannot take its customers for granted. Recent fare wars have proved that price, not security, is the bottom line for many passengers.

Another key factor is Israeli wanderlust. Kleinman pointed out that at least 1.5 million Israelis will travel overseas this year.

"Not many countries can claim that one-quarter of their citizens go abroad every year," he said.

And even though young, post-army-age Israelis are world travellers, with a special fondness for the Far East, many older Israelis are also experimenting with visits to Thailand or India.

Kleinman said the peace process has not yet contributed to El Al's growth. However, he added, "We do anticipate a lot more traffic once Israel signs a peace agreement with Syria or Saudi Arabia."

Such an agreement "will give a major push to travellers, particularly Americans, who were afraid to come earlier," he said. "It will also open up the market for travellers interested in seeing more than one country in the Middle East."

In addition to passenger travel, El Al operates a successful cargo service, which accounted for 25 per cent of the company's revenues last year. The company handles 60 per cent of all cargo traffic at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Although the company is flying high at the moment, with market growth between five per cent between Israel and the United States and 12 per cent between Israel and the Far East, increased competition could cut in to investors' profits.

Any potential buyer must weigh El Al's standing vis-a-vis other airlines.

According to a recent report in the Israeli business monthly Link magazine, increased competition from other carriers has dropped the company's share of the Israeli market from about 50 per cent in the early 1990s to 41 per cent today.

The piece of the pie could get even slimmer now that World Airways, a U.S. carrier, and Air Canada recently launched services to Israel.

The magazine also said that even though El Al now "enjoys a monopoly on direct flights out of Israel to the Far East," once the anticipated flights of Thai Airways, Air India and Korean Airlines begin, profits may go to the competition.

The "Shabbat issue" is another concern. Although no one at El Al would dare say so publicly, its Shabbat no-fly policy is costing the airline customers.

It is not clear how privatization will affect the policy. A couple of months ago, when local newspapers reported rumors that El Al was prepared to fly on Shabbat as a means of attracting investors and customers, the government quickly denied the reports.

When asked about the future, Joseph Ciechanover, El Al's chairman of the board of directors, said that for now, El Al could not fly on Shabbat because that is the government's decision.

But, he added, "I don't know what will happen in the future."

Despite such challenges, many travel industry insiders believe privatization will be good for El Al — and ultimately its customers.

Whether all 51 per cent of the airline's shares will be floated simultaneously on the Israeli and world stock exchanges is still under discussion.

Iron determination leads Chinese doctor to Israel

World Zionist Press Service

A traditional doctor of Chinese medicine from Beijing who converted to Judaism and immigrated to Israel is not a usual phenomenon in that country.

And Dr. Yu Shen, 44, is indeed a most unusual woman. Her slight build and shy, girl-like charm deny the years of hardship and deprivation she underwent during Mao Tse Tung's cultural revolution in China and mask her iron determination to follow her own professional and personal path.

Shen was the second daughter of two of China's intellectual elite. Her father, a professor at Peking University, was awarded a scholarship in the 1930s and received his PhD in biochemistry at Cornell University. He was a pioneer in the study of vitamins at a time when the importance of vitamins was just being recognized in the United States. Refusing lucrative offers to remain in the United States, he returned to China to help his people.

During this period, which Shen describes without rancor or bitterness, she became interested in traditional Chinese medicine and taught herself about herbs, massage techniques and other traditional practices. In 1973, she became seriously ill and was sent back to Beijing.

After recovering, Shen taught herself acupuncture and English and began studying at the Beijing College of Traditional Medicine to become a doctor.

In 1983, she left China and travelled to the United States where she began working as a research assistant at the University of Pennsylvania while studying for her masters degree in the history of sciences.

"I was always interested in the integration of Eastern and Western medicine and I wanted to see American doctors practising traditional Chinese medicine," she says.

While studying at the university. Shen met her husband, Massachusetts-born Dr. Philip Lansky, a medical school graduate who was working on blending Eastern and Western medical practices. Shen underwent an Orthodox conversion in the United States, which she admits was difficult.

Shen's mother studied nutrition at the Yen Ging University in China, which is run by the Rockefeller Foundation and affiliated with Harvard University. Both were fluent in English and were in contact with American doctors and professors in their fields.

However, their achievements were also their undoing during the purges of the Chinese cultural revolution. They were among the intellectuals, artists and city people sent by Mao for re-education, to live in the poorest villages and to connect with the peasants through forced physical labor and deprivation.

"My parents never complained about this time in their lives," says Shen. "I know nothing of what they went through."

In 1969, Shen was separated from her family and sent to a remote village with 17 others. "We lived and worked as peasants," she recalls. "We lived in caves, our food was below subsistence level and we were forced to do very hard labor."

"In communist countries such as China, there is no religion, only the culture of Buddhism," Shen explains. "My only previous contact with Judaism was through two academic advisers who were Jewish. The first time I entered the synagogue in Philadelphia, I was overwhelmed. I felt that I was taking part in something ancient. I was very much in awe."

Both the Chinese and Jewish cultures are family oriented, says Shen, and both are complete ways of life. "In China, one must follow one's husband. That's why we are here in Israel."

Lansky visited Israel seven times prior to their aliyah, mostly to attend conferences. Coming from a traditional family with a brother who is a renowned Yiddish scholar in the United States, Lansky gives two main reasons for their decision to come to Israel: "We came as a way of connecting to the Jewish tradition and providing this for our children. We also felt that the climate in Israel was conducive to the spread of alternative medicine. Our aliyah process was a mutual evolution. It was more of an openness to come, to see, to take small steps one day at a time."

Lansky feels that being here is a challenge, and professionally both he and Shen have much to offer. "The academic field in Israel is open to natural medicine; it is a growth industry in which Shen and I both have a deep grounding."

Traditional medicine

Shen took an ulpan when they first arrived in Israel, but dropped out after two months. Her two daughters, aged four and six, however, have picked up Hebrew quickly and adapted well to their new life in Israel. Shen is trying to teach them the Chinese language and culture, but with English being the language at home and Hebrew the language at school, Chinese gets lost in the middle.

Lansky is now director of the privately owned American Homeopathic Clinics, with branches in Haifa, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Shen discovered a new traditional Chinese medicine clinic in Jerusalem where she works twice a week. "I like it because here I can practise pure traditional Chinese medicine," says Shen. "But I only take English speaking patients," she laughs. "I'm not adept enough in Hebrew to administer treatment to Israelis."

Shen's family in China is concerned about her safety. Her decision to live in Israel disturbs them far more than her conversion to Judaism and an observant lifestyle.

"Orientals do not know much about Israel. For them, it is synonymous with danger," she says.

Although Shen naturally feels homesick for China and her family, her attitude toward Israel and her chosen path is optimistic. "I am using my knowledge to heal people," she says. "And if I didn't come to Israel I would never have met these people, known the richness of the culture, nor understood the true core of Western civilization."

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE IN THE OLD CITY OF JERUSALEM

This photo of the church was taken by a Jerusalem photographer, Mr. John Diness, over 150 years ago. It was discovered along with a collection of his photographs about three years ago at a yard sale in the U.S. by photographer John Barnier. More than 130 prints and glass negatives of Diness' photos were recently purchased for the Israel Museum. Mr. Diness and his partner ran a photographic studio which advertised "photos of the Holy Land taken on site."

Masters teaching chess skills to a new generation

World Zionist Press Service

Luba Alterman is a kindergarten teacher near Tel Aviv. Nahum Olanovsky teaches physical education to Bedouin youngsters near Beersheva. Eduard Duchovny is a night watchman at the Bar Ilan University outside Tel Aviv.

All recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union, these three are also champion chess players — international masters and grandmasters, ranked in the world's top 400. Together with dozens of other international class recent immigrant players, they are spearheading a chess revolution — raising local tournament play to a world-class level and introducing thousands of children to the game.

In the last five years, Israel has moved from an average chess country — ranked in the second dozen — to fifth in the world (behind Russia, Yugoslavia, England and Hungary). Says Shai Biushinsky, who is one of the world's top class software developers, "and it's all because an incredible number of great players have moved here."

Jerusalem attracted 200 competitors under bar mitzvah age, and while many of the proud parents speak Russian, among the children staring at the rooks and pawns, all talk is in Hebrew.

International ratings show three recent immigrants in the world's top 60: Leon Yudasin, Ilya Smirin and Boris Alterman (Luba's husband). There are now some 20 grandmasters here, up from three just five years ago.

For the players themselves, though, the move to Israel has been a crash landing. They've gone from being professionals — and national heroes respected much like basketball stars in North America — to amateurs forced to play in their free hours.

In the Soviet Union, says former Ukraine champion Boris Alterman, the state paid all grandmasters and masters. "It was a profession, like any other. But when we came here and wrote "chess-player" on the immigration forms, the officials only smiled and changed it to "no profession."

Luba Alterman, whose twin sister is now Germany's national champion, says chess was "a Jewish profession" in the Soviet Union, but that "in the Jewish state no one thinks a person should earn a living playing chess." So the board masters have taken the initiative themselves.

The number of chess clubs has mushroomed from about two dozen to 100 since the start of the current aliyah wave in late 1989, and a 12-team national league has been established, "dramatically raising the level of the game here," according to Moshe Slav, chair of the Israel Chess Federation's immigrants committee.

While the initiative for starting clubs has usually come from the new arrivals, Israeli players have been quick to join and improve their game with the help of one-time pros from the C.I.S. "We have people here now who spent their lives training and teaching," says Slav. In league games most players are Soviet born, but many veteran Israelis have also made the teams. Israeli Russian papers provide their readers with regular coverage of major matches, but the Hebrew papers have yet to follow suit.

Since 1993, over 100 schools and community centres have begun offering chess courses and a youth league has sprung up. A recent two-month youth tournament in Olansky, for example, in addition to teaching soccer to Beduin children in Tel Sheva, also started to teach them chess after school. Dozens now attend classes. Since arriving from Baku, in Muslim Azerbaijan, he has learned Arabic and become a local hero, with clan heads vying with each other to invite the intellectual foreigner to their homes.

Former Belarus champion Boris Malisov has managed to eke out a living in Jerusalem by teaching chess in some half dozen schools and community centres.

"I just couldn't see myself doing anything else," he says. "And I'm glad for some of the successes my kids are beginning to have."

Malisov's youth team from the Sieff Community Centre has just won the national community

Coining the many phases of history

By LILI EYLON
Jerusalem Dateline

Round diminutive clues to history, coins minted by kings, rulers, cities and states have been with us since time immemorial. A new gallery at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem traces the story of man's means of payment throughout the ages.

Among the many items on view are 9,000-year-old cowrie shells found in the Judean desert, gold ingots from Samaria, copper and bronze ingots used by Canaanites 4,000 years ago and Venetian glass beads used as money in Africa as recently as 100 years ago.

While the Israeli shekel is not a valuable coin today, the money used in the time of the Kingdom of Judah was based on weight, with a shekel weighing 11.2 grams of silver. Also on display from the Kingdom of Judah from about 700 BCE are stone weights. A bone pocket scale for coins from the Hisham Palace in Jericho dates back to the same era.

One female slave could be purchased in 250 BCE with the value of a Ptolemaic hoard of silver coins, such as were excavated from the seacoast settlement of Tel Dor. Another hoard of 36 coins, dating from 132-135 CE, was found recently in two pottery jugs. This amount was sufficient to lease a farm.

Demonstrating that inflation is not a modern invention, 2,000 minute bronze coins from the beginning of the 6th century CE indicate that this was a period of peak inflation. The coins were worth the equivalent of one-third of a gold solidus.

And, again, despite the fact that a block of 600-year-old Mameluke coins found in a shipwreck off the coast of Megadim, near Haifa, weighed 50 kilograms, it equalled only half of an average monthly salary.

Silver drachmas struck in Jerusalem around 370 BCE, gold, silver and bronze Judea capta coins minted in Rome to commemorate the fall of Jerusalem, coins from the Ummayad and Abbasid period (650-868 CE) as well as from the Crusader Kingdom of Jerusalem are all included in the display.

There is even a coronation coin of Baldwin I who called himself First King of Jerusalem (1100 CE), which is believed to be the only coin of this kind in existence today.

Israel could become chess powerhouse centres championship.

Few of Malisov's students are from Russian-speaking families. Teaching first- and second-graders at a school in Bayit Vegan, the burly immigrant, leather cap pulled over salt-and-pepper hair, moves from board to board, arranging pieces to present challenges: "White, checkmate in two moves."

With the talent available, Israel could now become a real power in international chess if only the money were available. Sadly, though, says the Chess Federation's Slav, "International achievement in chess just is not regarded with much respect here. The country spends a fortune on mediocre soccer and basketball teams, while our people have to pay from their own pocket to get to the biennial chess Olympiad."

The Chess Federation's annual budget, Slav says, is 1.2 million shekels, which comes from Education Ministry grants, membership fees and private donations. That must cover all club and league expenses and participation by a dozen top players in at least 10 tournaments abroad, which is essential for an international rating.

With proper funding, says Slav, a new generation of players, including world championship finalists in the 14- and 16-year-old age groups, have the talent to reach the top adult world rankings.

For that to happen, though, there has to be a change in the country's attitude to chess. The grandmasters are working on it at grassroots level. Next, the media has to take more of an interest. Then, who knows, being a "chess-player" here might even become a recongized profession.

The physician/patient relationship requires trust based on communication. To ensure communication, Israeli doctors are being innovative. With the help of a flip chart designed by JDC-Israel and the Ministry of Health, an Israeli doctor advises an Ethiopian immigrant patient on the proper use of nasal drops. [Isranet Photo]

Charting a course to good health

By DANIELLA ASHKENAZY
Jerusalem Dateline

When verbal communication is limited, how does a doctor insure that a patient speaking another language will take a medication after eating, and not on an empty stomach? Or not drink his eye drops? Or swallow a suppository?

A pictograph/photograph flip chart for physicians, nurses and pharmacists was developed jointly by a team of Israeli health personnel for just this purpose, after health officials received calls from doctors in the field saying they were having difficulties communicating with their immigrant patients from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union.

The chart contains photographs of different medications and their packaging — various forms of pills, bottles of syrup, tubes of ointments and suppositories wrapped in foil. Each kind of preparation is accompanied by additional information in visual form, explaining its proper use and dosage.

Simple pictures instruct the patient on how to give medication to a child: give it in a baby bottle, swallow it from a spoon, or take it in a cup of water. The visual portrait of "in the morning," "at noon" and "at night" — sports a rising sun, a sun at high noon, and a moon and stars — not just the face of a clock.

The flip chart was also designed to "remind" doctors to ask all the necessary questions — including a picture of a pregnant woman and a woman nursing a baby.

"In traditional societies a woman may not tell a doctor she is pregnant. It's a matter of modesty," revealed Dina Lipsky, coordinator of health programs at the department for the absorption of Ethiopian immigrants at the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. She conceived of the flip chart solution together with Nira Baram, of Israel's Ministry of Health, and Diane Levin, director of the health education department at General Sick Fund headquarters.

While the chart was designed to meet the needs of immigrants to Israel, Lipsky says flip charts of this nature could be adapted for use by other multilingual societies, low literacy groups and refugee populations around the world.

Channa Marron putting on her makeup before the Israeli premiere of Pygmalion in 1954 [Michal Rosh Ban-Ami photo]

Channa Marron: 'alive and kicking'

By SHARON KANON

"I'm still alive and kicking," said the actress in a radio interview shortly after the opening of an exhibition, Channa Marron: The Role of the Actress, at Tel Aviv University's Shrieber Art Gallery.

Not only is she alive and kicking (which is pretty remarkable for a woman who lost her leg and almost her life, and who has been on stage for 65 years), she is also performing in Israel and abroad.

The actress who has received numerous awards including the coveted Israel Prize, began her career in the theatre, movies and radio in Berlin at the age of five.

Marron, the grand lady of Israel's theatre, has appeared in more than 85 plays, playing roles in settings as varied as Shakespeare and Ibsen, Becket and Pinter, or a TV sitcom. Whatever role she plays, her audience sees the actress through the prism of her experiences.

Her life and fortunes, her art and her spirit have been inextricably enmeshed with the growth of theatre in Israel and with the fate of the nation. Herself a victim of a terrorist attack, Marron abhors violence.

Personally, she symbolizes strong determination to overcome obstacles, "to decide one's own fate." The two themes appear again and again in the roles she has played. "I believe it is the responsibility of the theatre to have a voice in the life of the country."

Born in Berlin in 1923, Marron was discovered at the age of four. Her acting talents were encouraged at the Montessori school she attended, where she developed a love for the arts and reading. She also learned French, which was very useful when she and her mother fled to Paris in 1932 to escape the Nazis.

"It was the most difficult year of my life. I found out what it is to go hungry and to be a refugee; and I learned how to get along." In 1933, mother and daughter immigrated to Palestine, where her father had come earlier. Marron spent time on a kibbutz and when World War II began, the spunky teenage actress volunteered for the Women's Unit in the British army. She was among the first to join the theatre group in the Jewish Brigade.

A period of professional growth in Marron's life began when she joined Habimah, Israel's classic theatre. It was here that she learned to improvise. In 1945, Marron was one of the founders of the new Israeli theatre, the Cameri, and veered towards modern drama for the next two decades. In the role of Hedda Gabler and other Ibsen women, she championed equality and independence for women.

Personal tragedy struck in 1970 when Marron was almost killed in a terrorist attack in the Munich airport. She was thrown far away from the wounded, where no one saw her. When she was finally found, she was brought to the hospital where doctors saved her life, but they could not save her leg. The first thing Marron said when she recovered consciousness was, "I'm an actress."

Medea, the ancient Greek tragedy, was the first role Marron was offered after her recovery. The story of a mother who kills her own children in revenge presented a double-pronged difficulty for the actress. She had to battle on two fronts: to portray the complicated, crazed woman who uses revenge to assuage her own pain; and to deal with her own physical limitations on stage with an artificial leg.

The play took on a political importance for it showed the terrible things that people are capable of doing to each other. "At the end of the play, I wanted the audience to feel shaken, overwhelmed, I wanted them to understand that violence is not the way to solve problems."

Books in Brief

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

With the holidays coming so late this year, we probably expected to get all our preparations done in plenty of time to have endless hours for enjoying the new books that have come in.

After finding ourselves, as usual, madly whipping up one more kugel at the last minute, or tracking down the sukkah table which somehow got stashed in the furnace room last year, let's take a few minutes to relax and have a good read.

Unusual for us here (and no, I don't know why), we have several excellent books for children.

Molly Cone's Listen to the Trees; Jews and the earth (UAHC Press, 1995) is a wonderful book describing how today's concern with the environment echoes the injunctions of the Torah.

Parables and short stories help illustrate the biblical and Talmudic injunctions that have a startling relevance. Did you know that preserving trees and proper disposal of waste are not just good for the earth but are actually halachic rulings?

The illustrations by Roy Doty are beautiful.

Even non-Orthodox children will enjoy The Story Hour, Vol. 2, edited by David Pape (Hachai Pub. Co., 1995). This book of short stories, with settings ranging from modern to ancient, presents the message in each story subtly and enjoyably. In one, a young girl in a wheelchair discovers that G-d will help her walk — but only after she forces herself to practise. In another, a group of inner-city kids discover that bravado does not protect them from the natural world.

One of the most delightful collections of stories I have seen in a long time is Fables for All Ages by Frieda Clark Hyman (Gefen, 1995). A community of birds learn valuable lessons on living together from venerable Gaffer Robin, who uses wisdom from the Torah and Jewish lore to guide them.

Much of the humor comes from the very human characteristics and behaviors of the birds — Jody Wren is unfaithful to his wife, Jenny; Oswald Owl is naive; Cassie cuckoo braves the wrath of the other cuckoos to raise her family herself.

An excellent series of articles about that modern-day buzzword continuity (calling continuity a buzzword is almost a buzzword in itself) is The Jewish Family and Jewish Continuity, edited by Steven Bayme and Gladys Rosen (KTAV, 1994).

It deals with such seminal issues as divorce, abortion, adoption, the women's movement, intermarriage and the family as a whole.

While at first glance the book may seem intimidating, one is quickly caught up in its analyses.

Ethics is another of today's major concerns, and KTAV has published a fascinating series of letters and responses by Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits, former chief Rabbi of the British Commonwealth.

Dear Chief Rabbi, edited by Jeffrey Cohen (1995) covers the years of his chief rabbinate, 1980-1990, and deals with such issues as Zionism, the peace process, interfaith relations, shechitah, medical ethics (including AIDS) and the modern synagogue.

David Roskies' A Bridge of Longing; the lost art of Yiddish storytelling (Harvard University Press, 1995) can't help being somewhat wistful, even while being a truly scholarly discussion of the subject.

The author discusses the place of storytelling in the Yiddish world that is now gone, and how it has been transmogrified by modern writers, like I.L. Peretz.

Roskies also discusses the relationship of Yiddish tales to the Holocaust.

It's a Mitzvah! Step-by-Step to Jewish Living by Bradley Artson (Behrman House, 1995) harkens back to that classic of the 1970s, the Jewish Catalogue series. It tries to make Jewish tradition relevant to modern Jewish life, stressing such matters as ecology, caring for the poor and compassion to animals, along with Jewish ritual.

This book uses pictures especially well, not just to illustrate the text, but to teach their own lesson.

The exquisitely beautiful and moving Song of Songs is translated into modern terms by Ariel and Chana Bloch (Random House, 1995). Fortunately, the Blochs manage to keep the delicacy and poetic flow of older translations:

"The curve of your cheek/ a pomegranate/ in the thicket of your hair;"

"I must rise and go about the city,/ the narrow streets and squares, till I find/ my only love."

The commentary and introduction are especially fascinating and do much to illuminate the philosophic underpinnings of Song of Songs.

I must admit that I don't generally enjoy books about ultra-Orthodox or chassidic girls struggling with philosophical angst against the strictures of their societies. I mean, wouldn't you just love to even once hear them say that they love their lives and look forward to making a religious home for their scholar husband and numerous children?

Well, that doesn't happen in Pearl Abraham's The Romance Reader (Putnam, 1995). Rachel is a teenage girl living with her visionary rebbe father; her family tries, as is customary in those circles, to protect her from pernicious outside influences.

Naturally, she begins to read romance novels at the library and dreams of breaking out of her increasingly claustrophobic life.

While totally predictable, the book is redeemed by vivid characterization and truly literate writing.

A much more satisfying read is The Jewish War by Tova Reich (Pantheon, 1995).

Yehudi HaGoel is the charismatic leader of an extreme Zionist group. The book follows HaGoel from his early days in the Bronx to his almost mystical, messiah-like leadership against an Israeli Army determined to destroy a secession by Judea and Samaria from Israel.

Not a Sandy Koufax

By SHEL KRAKOFSKY

What do I have in common with Jews?
I have hardly anything in common even with myself.
— diary of Franz Kafka

On this day of Yom Kippur, Uncle Bill is sitting beside me and my father in synagogue and acknowledging the surrounding smiles and congratulations. He appeared last night in his dream of dreams, a pitcher in the seventh and deciding game of the World Series. He is easy to recognize as he tips his yarmulka to the congregants with an athlete's cultivated insincere sincerity and modestly immodest grin. Without his usual hearty breakfast, Uncle Bill is looking a little pale.

My mind always wanders on Yom Kippur, that sundown-to-sundown autumn Holy Day that begins with the recitation of Kol Nidre in darkness and ends with the piercing, shrill sound of the shofar the following day, also in darkness. It is during this one-day period that God ostensibly decides our fates for the coming year and the kind of season in store for Uncle Bill and baseball players everywhere. If the bookies could, they'd try to get their hands on that yearly celestial printout, that's for sure.

Why Uncle Bill had been brought up from the farm in September was a controversial, if only minor, point in baseball circles. Up until last night, he still hadn't thrown a single pitch in over a month with the big club. Yet the manager, a chatty and chubby character with a rumpled face the color and consistency of one of my grandmother's pieces of gefilte fish, wanted him in the bullpen for his age and experience.

"He can settle down my young flamethrowers," the manager told the press. "His arm has probably had it but you need stability out there in the pen. And maybe a miracle if we need him. I hear he's a dreamer."

A dreamer for sure, my Uncle Bill. Also marginal. Uncle Bill was destined to always be on the sidelines just like his ancestors, revilers in bullpens around the world, called upon only in specific situations in the hope they wouldn't screw up if given the chance. Something like the kid invited to skip double-dutch. If he jumped in before or after the right time, he wrecked it for everybody. And if there was a screwup, they had the likes of Uncle Bill to blame. Only Uncle Bill never seemed smart enough to know it.

Big, solid, loose-limbed with a lumbering gait, Uncle Bill looked awesome in a baseball uniform, chewing his tobacco and spitting at appropriate times to intimidate batters. (They spit right back so I guess it was a draw.) And always he talked and dreamed about delivering the big pitch, a tension-filled release that would leave a batter twisted and handcuffed at the plate as he struck out mightily with the bases loaded in the ninth inning to give Uncle Bill's team the seventh game of the World Series by one run.

Uncle Bill spent hours deep in thought, feet propped up, picturing the mob scene that would immortalize him. "Yup, it was a curveball," he would fantasize telling the reporters crowded around his locker. "I've got tons o'confidence init. Notice I shaked off Yogi's sign even at three-and-two. He called fastball, low and inside. Boy, did you see the sweep on that effing pitch. Ain't nobody was gonna hit that one. Nobodddy!"

Uncle Bill assaulted the English language with the aplomb of Dizzy Dean. All those years in the minors, he had acquired a peculiar syntax and grammar that made him sound like a southerner. Hardly anybody knew that Uncle Bill could trace his origins to some shtetl in Poland or before that from God-knows-where. Like his forefathers he wandered, pitching at various forgettable hot dog stands, taking his only tool, a sometimes deceptive left-handed curveball, to an assortment of one-industry-and-horse towns.

He used to send me clippings and occasionally a scuffed up autographed ball signed with a flourish, "See you in the BIG LEAGUES . . . Uncle (Lefty) Bill." The stories never gave the impression he would make it. A relief pitcher with modest skills, he had been up a few times for a cup of coffee but not much more. Over 18 years he had never been up long enough to deliver that big pitch — let alone a lot of smaller ones — all those years bouncing around like a line drive in an outfield corner.

We had never met any of his wives — three at last count — picked up in those towns like easy ground balls, all soon lobbed away with the sincerity of batting practice pitches. There might have been a kid or two but he never really said. Broke his nose a few times

'A prayer as beguiling and seductive as a knuckleball'

too down in the minors, the results of brush-back brawls, inevitable with a pitcher of Uncle Bill's limited ability.

"Records n'noses are men-tubby broken," he would explain to us.

Proudly sitting beside Uncle Bill now, mere hours since the end of the World Series, I'm thinking back to those days when some of my friends and I had to make what for us was a monumental decision. We had to decide whether to continue with afterschool Hebrew studies or whether to pursue a career in professional baseball through our little league teams. Not really a tough decision for 13-year-olds. We all opted for baseball and in that sense we're all failures.

For my bar mitzvah present, Uncle Bill decided to take me shopping for a new glove. How thrilled I remember being, going downtown with my father's youngest brother to purchase a mitt. He was with a team in the Carolinas at the time, North or South I can't recall, and only on a Double A league. But who cared. Uncle Bill was a pro.

Even the fellow who sold us the glove had heard of Uncle Bill, a local boy with a chance of making it. I didn't realize then that Uncle Bill was bigger news at home than at his workplace. On our way to the sporting goods store, I tried to speak in jock talk after Uncle Bill described a close, recent loss.

I said something like, "Winning isn't everything. It's how you play the game."

Said Uncle Bill, "So how come they keep score?"

I can still see Uncle Bill that day pounding various gloves with his cocky, professional demeanor, sniffing at the polished, redolent leather like a knowing hunting dog, pawing at the webbings with a player's love and lust. When he finally decided on the oversized glove he was going to buy for me, he put an avuncular arm around my shoulder and said, "Son (professional athletes don't call anybody nephew), lemme teachya a lesson today. Buyin' a baseball mitt is somethin' akin to gettin' married. It's somethin' y'only wanna do once." He was on his first wife at the time.

I was impatient before the cantor started to sing Kol Nidre as I watched the only overflow crowd of the year settle into the seats. Had I known for sure he was going to pitch last night — you never know with a relief pitcher and with Uncle Bill the chances were never good anyway — I might have tried to persuade my father to pass up Kol Nidre services altogether in order to watch my uncle pitch in the game of his life. I skipped enough Kol Nidre in the past under less pressing pretexts.

The plaintive yet matter-of-fact cantor's voice sang the recitation that made us all equal, no matter the cut and style of our clothes, no matter our piety or lack of concern. He recited Kol Nidre three times as legend suggests, to allow the tardy to hear his plea on their behalves. Caught in the synagogue, I was very aware that they're not as considerate at ball parks and never repeat the first innings of baseball games for the tardy, not even the seventh game of the World Series.

Of all the explanations I've ever heard or read about that little prayer of Kol Nidre, none has ever been satisfying. Both the words and their interpretations have changed to accommodate historical realities and moods — something like the Designated Hitter rule.

בִּישִׁיבָה שֶׁל מַעְלָה וּבִישִׁיבָה שֶׁל מַטָּה.
עַל דַּעַת הַמָּקוֹם וְעַל דַּעַת הַקָּהָל,
אָנוּ מַתִּירִין לְהִתְפַּלֵּל עִם הָעֲבָרָיָנִים.

כָּל נִדְרֵי

כָּל נִדְרֵי, וְאֲסָרֵי, וְקוֹנָמֵי, וְכִנּוּיֵי,
וְקוֹנָסֵי וּשְׁבוּעוֹת, דִּנְדַרְנָא
וְדְאָשְׁתְּבַעְנָא, וְדַאֲתַרְכְּנָא וְדַאֲסַרְנָא
עַל נַפְשָׁתָנָא, מִיּוֹם כִּפּוּרִים זֶה עַד
יוֹם כִּפּוּרִים הַבָּא עָלֵינוּ לְטוֹבָה.
כֻּלְּהוֹן אִתְּחָרְטְנָא בְהוֹן. כֻּלְּהוֹן יְהוֹן
שָׁרָן, שְׁבִיקִין שְׁבִיתִין, בְּטֵלִין
וּמְבָטָלִין, לָא שְׁרִירִין וְלָא קַיָּמִין.
נִדְרָנָא לָא נִדְרֵי, וַאֲסָרָנָא לָא אֱסָרֵי,
וּשְׁבוּעָתָנָא לָא שְׁבוּעוֹת.

And yet the rhyming, unintelligible logic disclaiming vows (past, present, future — two of the above?) has never failed to bring out the masses. It is a prayer as beguiling and seductive as a knuckleball.

I don't understand and can barely read the language though it's easy to recognize the Hebrew letters — athletic, bold, muscular, broad-shouldered — embedded in the age-old turf that never yields to the dignified, confused anguish of those aleph, bets.

By the authority of the heavenly court
And by the authority of the earthly court,
With the consent of the Omnipresent One
And with the consent of this congregation
We declare it lawful to pray with sinners

KOL NIDRE

All personal vows we are likely to make, all personal oaths and pledges we are likely to take between this Yom Kippur and the next Yom Kippur, we publicly renounce. Let them all be relinquished and abandoned, null and void, neither firm nor established.
Let our personal vows, pledges and oaths be considered neither vows nor pledges nor oaths.

L' Shana Tovah

The seventh game, if necessary, would be played Kol Nidre night

Today marks a first for me and Uncle Bill. Rarely here myself, I've never seen or been with him in a synagogue. Although the day of my bar mitzvah, while he passed on the morning services, Uncle Bill did come to watch me play a Saturday afternoon game with my new mitt, his way of commemorating my coming of age. He didn't have to attend synagogue, he claimed, because he played baseball, the first game in the first verse of the Bible.

"In-the-big-inning," he would laugh. "You can look it up son," he would tease, quoting Casey Stengel, his favorite biblical scholar.

My father and I had tickets to all the home Series' games courtesy of Uncle Bill. "Don't mention it son," he replied to my thank you. And there he sat in the bullpen during all the games, almost motionless, dreaming in his dream, only interrupting it with the occasional disdainful release of a wad of tobacco juice in no particular direction.

By the time the team had returned from the coast to play the last game here, deadlocked at three games apiece. Uncle Bill had never even been called to warm up.

My father was happy for Uncle Bill being brought up for the last month of the regular season. And now that he was in the World Series, my father's enthusiasm swelled. Even though it was October, baseball was extending my father's summer. He had been urging Uncle Bill the last few seasons to retire and look for a new future before "you end up a beer salesman."

Uncle Bill was still looking for that knockout punch after an inglorious career so that, as he put it, "Heck, after I make that one big pitch, I'll be doing beer commercials!"

Now my father was on Uncle Bill's side, dreaming right along with his kid brother. Yet with all of his recent encouragement, my father had been arguing all month with Uncle Bill to scratch himself from last night's game. As the season and the playoffs ended, the schedule showed the seventh game of the World Series, if necessary, would be played the night of Kol Nidre.

"Tell management in advance. If you tell them ahead of time, they can work around you," my father pampered. He didn't add the hurtful truth that the team would do just as well without Uncle Bill, Kol Nidre or any other night.

"Hey," said Uncle Bill, "lemme win the last game first, and maybe next year I'll refuse t'play Yom Kippur."

My father persisted until the last moment, even resorting to phone calls and telegrams. He used the tack that no matter what Uncle Bill did with his life, the greatest thing he could ever do for himself was also the most noble athletic statement he would ever get a chance to make. And that was to publicly declare that he would not play baseball during this holiest day.

"I got no example t'set," said Uncle Bill. "No Jewkids know 'but me anyway. If y'ain't famous, nobody knows yer secrets."

My father pointed out that Sandy Koufax sat out the opening game of the 1965 Series because it was played on Yom Kippur.

"So what," countered Uncle Bill. "I'm not a Sandy Koufax. He still got two starts that year. Won 'em both by shutouts, the last win the seventh game. He was good, won the Cy Young that year. He could afford tubby Jewish on Yom Kippur. By the way, two Dodgers sat out that Yom Kippur game."

"Two?"

"Yup. Y'ever heard of Jake Pitler, the Dodgers' first base coach?"

"No."

"You can look it up," chuckled Uncle Bill.

"Well," my father replied, "you've heard of him. Listen, I'm not even telling you to go to synagogue. I'm no saint. You know that the only time I go is the night before to hear Kol Nidre and then the next day. I hardly ever fast."

"So whatsa big deal?"

"It's like those old gym classes at school. When the whistle blew, I knew which squad I belonged to and ran there to have my attendance confirmed."

"Whataya sayin'?"

"I really don't care if there is a so-called Day of Judgment and that it's called Yom Kippur. But even though I'm no big league believer,

Sandy Koufax knew where he didn't belong on Yom Kippur

when the shofar is blown, I know where I belong. To be counted. Sandy Koufax knew where he didn't belong on Yom Kippur.''

''Yeah,'' reflected Uncle Bill with some sadness. ''Koufax knew he'd have other chances tubby remembered. This is probably gonna be m'last shot.''

My father has stopped trying to make sense of Yom Kippur and all other public religious observance. Yet he believes in what he calls Jewish destiny. It makes him feel comfortable to be part of a larger something, especially something his father told him he had inherited. If there is a God, he reasons, then that destiny is assured — although in what form, he's never told me. And if there isn't a God, the rest of the world has always made sure there is a common result for those of us chosen for whatever it is. That part I'm beginning to understand.

Uncle Bill sometimes heard those discussions but only ventured opinions about yesterday's box scores and what he considered to be his sure-to-improve pitching prospects. For Uncle Bill, everything was baseball and all things could only get better.

One time, when he was in between teams, Uncle Bill came to watch me play and was rooting for me on the sidelines in a game whose score I have since forgotten.

I was a shortstop with all the finesse, I thought, of one of those dark, lithe Latin Americans who would eventually make it, and like them, I would buy my parents a new home somewhere in the suburbs or in a sunny clime. Their choice.

Man on first, none out and Uncle Bill cups his hands and yells, ''Come on boychick, the old double play boychick, the old double play.'' He called me the same thing his grandfather had called him. I loved the encouragement but was happy the monicker never stuck. My adolescent buddies had enough nicknames in their arsenal for me without being taught another one, especially a Yiddish one that sounded downright androgynous. I preferred my uncle calling me son.

And sure enough, a ground ball to me. ''Come on boychick, the old double play boychick, the old double play.''

No excuses. A routine ground ball dribbled under my glove and between my legs which that day framed an open window to the outfield. Even my own teammates snickered at Uncle Bill's enthusiasm.

Now it's men on first and second, none out. My always optimistic Uncle Bill never let up. ''Come on boychick, the old triple play boychick, the old triple play!''

We were each other's biggest fan. And there I was last night, in a different stadium from my uncle, standing without cheering, among those who clenched our fists and hit our hearts with each confessing word like a metronome.

Except for Uncle Bill, on Yom Kippur all Jews are righthanded pitchers.

אָשַׁמְנוּ, בָּגַדְנוּ, גָּזַלְנוּ, דִּבַּרְנוּ דֹפִי;
הֶעֱוִינוּ, וְהִרְשַׁעְנוּ, זַדְנוּ, חָמַסְנוּ,
טָפַלְנוּ שֶׁקֶר; יָעַצְנוּ רָע, כִּזַּבְנוּ,
לַצְנוּ, מָרַדְנוּ, נָאַצְנוּ; סָרַרְנוּ,
עָוִינוּ, פָּשַׁעְנוּ, צָרַרְנוּ, קִשִּׁינוּ עֹרֶף;
רָשַׁעְנוּ, שִׁחַתְנוּ, תִּעַבְנוּ, תָּעִינוּ,
תִּעְתָּעְנוּ.

We have acted treasonably, aggressively and slanderously; we have acted brazenly, viciously and fraudulently; we have acted wilfully, scornfully and obstinately; we have acted perniciously, disdainfully and erratically.

An entire people gets together once a year to proclaim its guilt, fasting to atone for sins already committed, acknowledging they will occur again. Yom Kippur is surely the mother of psychiatry. Among us, there is no wonder why so many Jews go into it — from both ends of the tunnel.

Nobody died for our sins. We sit among the future victims.

Last night I was thinking about Uncle Bill and the roaring minyans at the ballpark painting their hot dogs with mustard and shelling their peanuts while I was becoming thirsty confessing to our collective sins and mounting petitions for forgiveness — for Uncle Bill as well. I pictured the fans'' clenched fists, also pounding rhythmically, only away from themselves towards the field. Where they were, only the losers would be guilty of anything. Uncle Bill liked his chances.

I flipped ahead the Siddur pages and realized we had reached about the fifth inning of services. A shameless glance at my watch indicated the game had made it to about the same point. Despite my father's lecture and debates, he gave me a nodding jerk of his head, a signal that he too considered that we had participated in a complete game. We quietly and quickly left for the stadium.

It was difficult to hear the announcer's voice above the din on the car radio as we raced toward the game. What was clear though was that the game was a slugfest, the pitchers on both sides pulverized towards early showers, no arm on either side strong enough to subdue the batters.

All the parking lots were full when we finally arrived so we parked a long distance from the stadium and jogged in our tailored suits at an excited pace towards the ominous bright lights of the stadium, their glow seeming to be powered by non-stop cheering, rising to panic levels and falling to mere explosions.

We got to our seats by the ninth. A look at the field and the scoreboard showed runners at second and third, two out and we were up a run. After an entire season, playoffs and almost seven World Series games, the smallest possible margin.

Only two pitchers remained in the bullpen, one of them Uncle Bill. When the inning began, the bullpen telephoned and blasted its shofar call and requested Uncle Bill to warm up. The young rightie got up too. Uncle Bill took off his jacket slowly and began to toss, spitting tobacco before every delivery. Pitch after pitch he flicked his glove to signal the practice catcher that Uncle Bill would be throwing a curve.

There was delay in the game as they put up a lefthanded pinch hitter and a gazelle to pinch run at third. Uncle Bill kept throwing curves. The manager emerged from the dugout and was greeted with boos and groans, all at the level of hysteria. Stalling for time, the manager talked for awhile on the mound before simultaneously touching his left elbow and pointing to the bullpen. Uncle Bill stopped throwing, picked up his jacket and began his slow walk to the mound, staining the grass almost every step with squirts of tobacco juice. This was no dream.

A clubhouse boy came out to get his jacket and the departing pitcher handed Uncle Bill the ball. My father was standing and yelling, "Show 'em Billy. Do it Billy. Come on Billy." The manager stayed on the mound while Uncle Bill took his allotted eight warmup pitches-all curveballs. It was obvious that whatever stuff he had, he had it last night. The manager spoke to Uncle Bill. "This is going to be an intentional walk. I want you to load 'em up so we can throw to any base for the final out."

"Okay," said Uncle Bill, "but we won't havta throw the ball anywhere after this batter. I'm gonna strike the next guy right outta there."

"No you won't."

"Whataya mean?"

"I'm pulling you after this guy. They've got a rightie coming up next. I just want to give the kid in the pen a few more warmup tosses. So take your time."

"No. No," pleaded Uncle Bill. I've got m'best stuff. Make no difference who's up next. I'll get 'im. It's all partam'dream. It can't miss."

"Damn your dreams. Just walk this guy. Four pitches, way outside. Got it?"

"I'm not playin' on Yom Kippur justa throw four intentional balls. Any asshole kin do that."

"What?"

"Y'heard me. Y'ever hearda Yom Kippur?"

"No, damn it. You really are a flake. This pressure's getting to you."

The fans wanted to get on with it. They were ready to riot, one way or the other. My father was screaming with the rest of them.

Uncle Bill refused to play his assigned part. "Yom Kippur y'see. I might be dead tomorrow for this. But not for four pitches anybody kin throw. It ain't worth it."

"Walk him," ordered the manager now toe-to-toe with his reluctant pitcher.

"Bring in the rightie," was Uncle Bill's final reply as he flipped the ball to his manager.

His spikes became bedroom slippers as Uncle Bill softly and elegantly shuffled off the field. He didn't spit once.

When he reached the foul line, the screaming mob was ready for a lynching. Uncle Bill was smiling as he doffed his cap to them and extended the greetings of his own, new season, "Gut Yonif, y'all."

The service is almost over. While we stand waiting for the shofar, fatigue and hunger add a hypnotic, sanguine peace as we sing and hum our final prayer together.

אָבִינוּ מַלְכֵּנוּ, חָנֵּנוּ וַעֲנֵנוּ, כִּי אֵין בָּנוּ מַעֲשִׂים; עֲשֵׂה עִמָּנוּ צְדָקָה וָחֶסֶד וְהוֹשִׁיעֵנוּ.

Our Father, our King, be gracious to us and answer us though we have no merits; deal charitably with us and save us.

After last night, Uncle Bill will never save any game. Swift Punishment? Maybe. Without throwing a baseball, he still got to deliver his big pitch.

The New Israel Fund of Canada

The New Israel Fund gets top marks for accountability.

This year, the American Institute of Philanthropy awarded the New Israel Fund an "A" for accountability.

Among eight leading Jewish charities, only the New Israel Fund received the top grade for delivering the highest percentage of its contributions to programs and grants, and for spending the lowest percentage on expenses and fund-raising.

In a time of shrinking resources, both at home and abroad, it's good to know that your charitable contribution is getting where it's supposed to go.

The New Israel Fund invests in people.

The New Israel Fund raises money for the people and communities of Israel. It is dedicated to civil and human rights, the equality of women, religious pluralism, peaceful co-existence and a more just society.

Through SHATIL (The Support Group for Voluntary Organizations), the New Israel Fund provides technical and organizational support to grassroots citizens' groups working for social justice and change in Israel.

Since 1982, SHATIL has assisted more than five hundred community-based, nonprofit organizations to increase their effectiveness. SHATIL's expert staff provide training in organizational development, management, fundraising, media and public relations, advocacy and volunteer supervision.

SHATIL enables Israelis to advocate more effectively, to improve their lives, the conditions in their communities, and the policies of their government.

The New Israel Fund is a partnership.

The New Israel Fund is a partnership made up of tens of thousands of people — Jewish and Arab, secular and Orthodox, Mizrachi and Ashkenazi, North American and Israeli — all working toward the common goals of promoting equality, religious pluralism, social justice, economic development and peace.

The New Israel Fund helps the people of Israel to improve their lives, their communities and their nation. We provide a way for Jews around the world to help shape an Israel they can continue to feel proud of.

Jewish Agency being restructured

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Agency, for generations one of world Jewry's main philanthropic and emotional links to Israel, is in the midst of a financial crisis of unprecedented proportions, the Agency's secretary general Howard Weisband said recently.

The Agency has responded with an ambitious financial restructuring plan that would see it slash $500 million (US) in expenditures and increase its income by $230 million over the next five years, Weisband said. If it succeeds, the Agency would be back on the road to financial well-being.

Weisband, a native of Pittsburgh who made aliyah in 1986, acknowledged the financial goals being advanced by the Agency were optimistic. "I have a lot of concern" whether they can be met, he said.

Weisband was in Toronto last week to speak to officials of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA), as well as to canvassers, students and professional staff.

"I'm here to bring information to those doing the canvassing so they can be more familiar with the Israeli side," he said.

Historically, half the money raised by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto goes for domestic needs such as Jewish education and social welfare, while the other half is allocated through the United Israel Appeal to the Jewish Agency.

The Agency pools the Canadian funds with money raised around the world to promote aliyah – bringing Jews to Israel and providing them with a "basket" of goods and services for their first year in the Jewish State.

Marx calls for public CJC review

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — What went wrong with the registration of delegates at the Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly in May and the hotly contested presidential election which dominated it?

Herbert Marx, a Quebec Superior Court justice and former justice minister, promised a thorough and open review. "Everything that happened will be aired. Everyone who has something to say will be heard," he told the Congress national executive at its recent meeting.

Marx was appointed last June by new Congress president Goldie Hershon to review the organization's national officer election bylaws, particularly those related to the accreditation and registration of voting delegates.

Marx told the executive that he favors a "public process" and that the commission's hearings should be open to The Canadian Jewish News and perhaps other media. This is at odds with what Hershon said last June; she said submissions and presentations should not be made public.

At a closed-door officers' meeting later, the other six members of the commission were appointed. Congress communications director Mike Cohen said he could not release the names until each had been notified and accepted the task. He did say the nominees will be nationally representative, and most, but not all, have Congress positions.

None, however, had any direct involvement with the various committees associated with the election, he said. Observers will also be invited to sit in.

Marx had no formal association with Congress when appointed chair. However, he has since been named a Quebec region officer and national executive member.

Interim accord on horizon

CJN News Services

TABA — As The CJN went to press last Friday, Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) were said to be close to initialing an interim agreement on expanding Palestinian autonomy and finalizing several thorny issues, including the status of Hebron's Jews.

The agreement was to be brought before last Sunday's cabinet meeting.

Meanwhile, in Jerusalem, Environment Minister Yossi Sarid and the PLO's Nabil Shaath began to discuss a timetable for the phased release of 5,500 Palestinian prisoners still held in Israeli jails.

But it remained unclear whether the two sides would initial an overall agreement before the prisoners' issue was resolved.

Unconfirmed radio reports said the deal will spell out security measures and a timetable for the redeployment of Israeli troops.

The News In Brief Everywhere

ISRAEL

Closure, Deaths

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force sealed the Gaza Strip last Wednesday, following information that Islamic Jihad was planning a suicide attack inside Israel.

The IDF said the closure would last at least until after Rosh Hashana.

Military sources said it was reasonable to assume that the expected signing of phase two of the Oslo accords and the Jewish holidays would attract suicide bombers.

In Nablus, a soldier opened fire and killed a teenager, after youths threw rocks at an army patrol. News of the death triggered riots in the city.

Israel Radio reported that a second man was shot dead in Nablus Wednesday night, in a continuation of the protests.

And Israeli security agents also arrested the mother of Yihye Ayyash, "The Engineer," considered the mastermind of the past year's suicide bombings, in a bid to track him down.

Ayyash's mother Aysha, 55, was taken to a police station for questioning about when she last saw her son.

'Weak' Extremists

JERUSALEM — Israeli police last week briefly detained five members of a grassroots settlers' movement on suspicion of incitement and distributing illegal documents.

Police issued the detention orders after searching the homes of the five men, all members of Zo Artzeinu (This is Our Land), a group that organized recent countrywide protests against Israel's negotiations with the Palestinians.

The five were released on bail.

Police Minister Moshe Shahal called the group "very extreme, but very weak."

Wall Rabbi Dies

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Yehuda Meir Getz, the rabbi of the Western Wall for the last 27 years, died last week following a heart attack. He was 71.

After moving from Tunisia to Israel in 1949, Rabbi Getz settled in the Galilee. He served in the army, rising to the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

After one of his sons was killed in the battle for Jerusalem during the 1967 Six Day War, Rabbi Getz moved to the Old City and settled in the Jewish Quarter.

He established a yeshivah there, and took up the duties he held until his death.

Russians and Iran

JERUSALEM — Russian officials told visiting Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week that they will proceed with plans to sell nuclear reactors to Iran, according to media reports here.

Russian Prime Minister Viktor Chernomyrdin and Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev reportedly told Rabin that the technology involved was of a "peaceful nature" and that the sales are within international law.

WHO's in Israel

JERUSALEM — The World Health Organization convened its annual European session in Jerusalem this week, the first time such a gathering has taken place in Israel.

Representatives from some 50 countries, including Israel, attended the Sept. 18 to 23 conference to discuss world health issues.

WORLD

Arson Suspect

BONN — German officials have arrested a suspect in the May 7 arson attack on the synagogue in the northern city of Lubeck.

Officials said the 27-year-old man is mentally unbalanced, and ruled out anti-Semitic motives.

The fire destroyed an extension to the synagogue but caused no injuries.

Germans Named Righteous

BERLIN — Twelve Germans who risked their lives to save Jews during World War II were honored this month here by Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial.

Avi Primor, Israel's ambassador to Germany, presented the Righteous Among the Nations awards. The mayor of Berlin also attended.

Ten members of the group — the largest to be recognized at once in Germany — were named posthumously.

During the war, the honorees sheltered Jews, often in their homes and businesses, and provided food and medical aid.

Synagogue Returned

TBLISI — Georgia's President, Eduard Shevardnadze, flew to a remote mountainous town last week for a celebration of the return to local Jews of a synagogue that had been confiscated by Communist authorities decades earlier.

At the celebration in the town of Oni, Shevardnadze joined a 10-member delegation of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee that was visiting Georgia at his invitation.

About 12,000 Jews live in the former Soviet republic.

Syrian Attends

BRUSSELS — The presence of the head of Syria's Jewish community at meetings of world Jewish leaders last week here was a "clear, political signal from Syria," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC).

A few months ago, Syria would not have let the Jewish leader, Yousef Jajati, go to the meetings of the WJC and the European Jewish Congress, said Steinberg.

Steinberg called Jajati's presence "very significant."

Congress executive frustrated at budget cuts

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress' frustration with seeing its budget whittled away came to the surface at the recent national executive meeting.

Congress received a five per cent cut by CJF Canada, the body that decides how much of the funds raised through local United Israel Appeal (UIA) campaigns should go to national Jewish organizations. That translates into a decrease of about $160,000, from $3.194 million to $3.034 million for July 1, 1995 to June 30, 1996.

Charles Zaionz, past chair of the national executive, asked CJF chair Richard Vineberg if the budgets of UIA and the major federations were being scrutinized as closely as that of Congress.

"There's a feeling, especially in Toronto, that funds coming from the Jewish taxpayer have been allocated unfairly in recent years ... Unless there is an equitable distribution of funds, the amount collected [in UIA campaigns] will diminish because people are unhappy," Zaionz said.

Congress' budget has been stretched so tight, he said, that staff cannot be paid increases, yet the federations, at least in Toronto and Montreal, are hiring away former Congress professionals and paying them more than Congress could.

Vineberg said CJF Canada has also taken a five per cent decrease in its approximately $400,000 annual budget. "It's simplistic to think that CJF Canada does whatever it wants," he said, noting that Congress representatives are involved in the decision-making. Vineberg is himself a past national Congress treasurer.

Five per cent reduction

He said the five per cent reduction in its own allocation is "part of the message of equity and fairness we are trying to get across" to the communities.

Vineberg rejected a suggestion that less money might be sent to Israel. "The Jewish Agency is running a $50-million deficit. If it keeps on, it will soon be $600 million in the hole."

Congress national treasurer Zave Climan said the $160,000 cut is being made almost equally between Congress' national and regional operations.

The two largest of the eight Congress regions will lose the greatest proportion: Quebec's share drops from $500,577 to $474,277; and Ontario's from $701,934 to $664,734. The only region untouched is the Pacific, whose budget remains at $197,255.

The allocation for national operations went down to $1.451 million from $1.543 million.

National executive member David Satok accused the Congress officers of "blithely going along without a fight," but Climan countered that Congress is "well-represented on CJF Canada and, in the end, it is their decision ... Realistically, we can't expect a penny more."

CJC regions to vote on resolutions

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Resolutions put on the backburner since the May Canadian Jewish Congress plenary assembly will be discussed and voted on at upcoming Congress regional council meetings.

The yeas and nays across the country will be tabulated to see whether the resolutions passed, a recent meeting of the national executive committee was informed.

Even though this recourse exists in Congress' national bylaws (25-H), the process will mark a departure from the organization's traditional practice of having outstanding resolutions dealt with at a meeting of Congress' national council, said resolutions chair Reisa Teitelbaum.

Because national council meetings have invariably been held in Montreal or Toronto, Teitelbaum said people outside Quebec and Ontario were for all intents "excluded" from the process.

The new system, she said, will be more representative of the national Jewish community and will maximize debate.

At the plenary, officials were embarrassed when it took almost an hour to muster a quorum for an early-morning resolutions session, even though the session is meant to address the most important issues facing the Canadian Jewish community, she said.

The delay kept 11 resolutions from being debated and made it a virtual certainty, Teitelbaum indicated, that the next plenary (1998 in Toronto) will schedule the resolutions session at a more convenient hour and allow more time for proper debate.

The resolutions still to be dealt with include those on hate propaganda and bias crime; combatting computer hate; collective and group rights; social security reform; women in poverty; the get; mental and physical abuse and sexual harrassment; and remedial legislation on workplace discrimination.

Other resolutions involve pensions for homemakers; gun control legislation; and preserving Jewish cemeteries in declining Jewish communities.

In reply to a question, Teitelbaum provided assurance that "a good half" of the resolutions that were passed at the assembly were indeed in the process of being "dealt with," including one that resolved that Congress investigate its own fundraising procedures.

"There is an ongoing process taking place," Teitelbaum said. "They are not being put in a drawer."

Congress national executive chair Renee Bellas expressed a similar sentiment.

"We have every intent of making sure that resolutions are not ignored," she said.

Settlers' situation pains Bar-Ilan professor

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A pained look crosses Prof. Shlomo Eckstein's face as the topic turns to the situation of Jewish settlers who have made their homes outside of Israel's pre-1967 borders.

"It's a deep, deep problem," said the president of Bar-Ilan University during a recent interview. An economist by profession, Eckstein is also a commentator on religious and societal issues in Israel.

Eckstein's own daughter lives in "one of those towns in the so-called territories. She raised five children there. For delegates of ... a Zionist movement which the whole nation supported, all of a sudden to see themselves as barriers to the peace process is a terrible situation."

There is no justification for the acts of the few religious settlers who have resorted to violence, he added.

One of the major problems is that the Arabs from the territories who worked in Israel for years have been supplanted by imported workers from countries such as Romania and Taiwan, said Eckstein. If not for Israel's fear of terrorist attacks, the borders could be opened again to Arab workers, he added.

"The terrorists know [their attacks] will create unemployment and discontent. I think an agreement between Israel and those territories which will be handed back, in such a way that labor and merchandise could move freely, would help the peace process to strike deeper roots."

Bar-Ilan University's contribution to the peace process lies largely in its BESA Institute, a strategic studies centre named for former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin and former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat.

The institute's role is "to provide a second opinion" on political issues and implications of various policies, said Eckstein. Affiliated researchers run the political gamut from right wing to left. "That's the way it should be," he said.

Shlomo Eckstein

Within the Jewish community of Israel, Bar-Ilan plays a significant role in bridging the growing gap between secular and observant Jews.

The gap is greater in Israel than in the Diaspora, Eckstein noted. In North America, even Reform Jews are connected to the Jewish community through their synagogues and their rabbis, he said. In Israel, "either you belong to the observant [group], or you don't."

All 20,000 Bar-Ilan students, about half of whom are from non-observant homes, must take courses in basic Jewish studies such as Tanach, Talmud, Jewish history and Jewish philosophy.

The courses are not proselytic, Eckstein emphasized, but are aimed at increasing knowledge and understanding.

In the 40 years since its establishment, 20,000 students have graduated from Bar-Ilan.

CLARIFICATION

In the article about Caron Feldman, a young Toronto woman suffering from anorexia, (The CJN, Jan.19, 1995) the impression may have been created that her father was instrumental in setting in motion the chain of events that led to her condition.

Mr. Feldman categorically denies that he arranged for Caron to take any diet pills.

The CJN apologizes for inadvertently creating this impression and for any embarrassment that may have resulted.

Ethiopian rabbinic student to address congregation

TORONTO — Yafet Alamu, a rabbinic student in Jerusalem who escaped from Ethiopia in 1982, will be the first Ethiopian Jew to be ordained by the Conservative movement.

On Oct. 1, at 8 p.m., Alamu will be the guest speaker here at a Tribute to Jerusalem 3000 program at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, 55 Yeomans Rd.

Alamu will speak on From Addis Ababa to Jerusalem, describing the dangerous and circuitous road that took him from his birthplace in a small village near the northern city of Gondar in Ethiopia to the Seminary of Judaic Studies (bet midrash), the academic centre of Masorti (Conservative) Judaism. The meeting is open to the public.

The proceeds of the evening sponsored by the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism will go to immigrant religious education and leadership training at the bet midrash.

On Oct. 3, Alamu will participate in the Kol Nidre service at Adath Sholom Synagogue, 864 Sheppard Ave.

Anti-Israel tone muted: prof

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The tone of the anti-Israel rhetoric was noticeably more moderate at the fourth World Conference on Women held earlier this month in Beijing than at previous United Nations (UN) conferences, according to University of Ottawa professor Anne Bayefsky.

Bayefsky attended the conference as a delegate of the International Women's Rights Action Watch, based at the Humphrey Institute in Minnesota, and of the American Society of International Law.

Through a grant from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation of Chicago, she is currently studying UN efforts to promote universal human rights.

The issue of "foreign occupation," which has been used before as a way to attack Israel, she said, was "sidelined to a small group and not allowed to dominate the rest of the negotiations [to prepare the final conference statement]."

In the draft text, Bayefsky noted, "there were a whole series of sections in which the Arab states wanted to insert 'foreign occupation' in various ways."

The issue was sent to a small negotiating group chaired by the United States, which included Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, the PLO, Cyprus, the European Union, Belgium, Norway, India, Pakistan and Turkey. The Arab-Israeli situation was not the only one in which foreign occupation was considered; it also arose about India and Pakistan, and Cyprus and Turkey.

Anne Bayefsky

The Arab representatives "took a hard line," she said, trying to insert a denunciation of foreign occupation in as many places as possible. They did succeed in including it in 10 different sections of the final platform of action.

As an example, she said the statement called upon "governments, the international community and ... society ... to take strategic action in the following critical areas of concern: poverty, inadequate educational opportunities, health care ... and the effects of persecution on women living in areas under foreign occupation."

While there was no explicit mention of Israel or any other state, she said she feels "absolutely" that it was obvious who was meant.

A "reliable, moderate source" in the Israeli delegation told her speeches "by the PLO, Syria, Lebanon and Iran attacked Israel in a manner that showed little regard for the peace talks."

The text of those speeches, as is generally the case with Arab countries, she said, were not distributed at the conference.

Regional groups

Israel, she said, might have been invited to participate in a new U.N. regional group which includes Canada, the U.S and Japan, "in view of its exclusion from all other regional groups and because of its political affinity with the other members. It wasn't." Israel is the only UN member excluded from participation in any regional groups.

On the last day of the conference, when the delegates picked up their copies of the final text, Palestinian women were distributing 'in the thousands" made-in-Egypt buttons saying "Freedom for Palestinian Prisoners" and postcards showing a woman holding a baby, a young girl and a bandaged man behind bars and the words "6,000 Palestinian detainees are still in Israeli prisons."

Although this was after the conference text was completed and could have no effect on the negotiations, "it was a parting shot," Bayefsky said.

She added that the conference revealed deep divisions between Islamic states and other developing countries, in particular those from sub-Saharan Africa.

"This could have implications for Israel in forming strategic alliances" she said.

The Sept. 14 CJN quoted a spokesperson for Sheila Finestone, Secretary of State for the Status of Women and leader of Canada's delegation to Beijing, as saying that Finestone is "not comfortable" speaking about Arab-Israeli or Jewish-Palestinian issues arising from the conference.

JNF Volunteers Come In All Ages

Toronto teenagers organize concert for JNF afforestation

Don't let anyone tell you that Jewish teenagers in Toronto are apathetic about their community or Israel! Larry Borins and Avi Glina, with the asistance of Adam Fingrut, demonstrated earlier this summer that a good idea and lots of hard work can work wonders.

The three Metro teenagers conceived, organized and produced a mass concert of several local bands with hundreds of their peers in attendance on the night of May 27 at Mel Lastman Square.

Selling novelty items such as T-shirts and asking for donations to help plant trees, these energetic and creative young people raised several hundred dollars to help JNF with its work in "making Israel green." Little did they know that just one month later, the Jerusalem area would be hit with the worst forest fire in Israel's history and that their efforts would be put to such immediate and important use in helping to start the replanting process.

Larry, Avi and Adam exhibited an initiative which bodes well for the new generation about to take its place in Toronto's Jewish Community. JNF welcomes such activity by the students of today as a harbinger of the leadership they will provide in the near future.

If there is a message that we should be positive regarding Jewish continuity, it can be found in the activity of these three dedicated young people and those who helped them create and succeed in putting together a night of fun and accomplishments.

Jerry Blitzer represents spirit of volunteers

Since his years as a teenager in post-war Europe, Jerry Blitzer has been a volunteer in the work of the Jewish National Fund. Coming to Canada to begin a new life, he not only survived, he flourished with a determination and energy that is readily apparent upon meeting him.

Jerry has served as JNF Chairman of the Raoul Wallenberg Yorkdale Circle Lodge of B'nai Brith for many years. He can been seen at each meeting urging members to "plant more trees."

His enthusiastic efforts have resulted in the planting of literally thousands of trees in Israel. His only reward is the knowledge that he has helped JNF in its ongoing effort to build a strong, beautiful and peaceful Israel. Jerry is now a JNF Toronto Board Member as well.

Nathan Hurwich celebrates another Bar Mitzvah!!!

Nathan O. Hurwich being congratulated by Larry King on the occasion of the 1992 JNF Toronto Negev Dinner.

Nathan O. Hurwich celebrated the 73rd Anniversary of his Bar Mitzvah at Beth Tzedec on August 12. At 86 years of age, Nat is still going strong in his communal volunteer work.

Following the reading of his maftir, he was feted at a gala lunch by leaders of the community. Greetings were extended by many of his friends and the communal organizations with which he has been associated for many years.

Nat and his wife, Roey, have been in the ranks of Toronto's organizational leadership for six decades. Their generosity and total involvement are legendary.

Nat has been a JNF volunteer for almost 50 years, has been a Board member, is Honourary Vice-President and a Life Governor of JNF in Toronto and a National Honourary Vice-President. In 1992, Nat was Honouree at the annual Negev Dinner.

He continues his work with JNF as an active canvasser and does not miss an opportunity to promote the work of JNF. Mazel Tov, Nat! Biz Hundert un Tzvanzik!

Meridor optimistic about peace process

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Dan Meridor

TORONTO — Those who expected yet another blistering denunciation of the Olso accords may have been disappointed with last week's talk by Likud MK Dan Meridor.

Declaring that he would not attack "Israel's legitimate government" while abroad, Meridor delivered a rather bland overview of the peace process and surprised some by stating he is optimistic over the long run.

But Meridor, a former Israeli justice minister, didn't let Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and his Labor coalition off the hook completely.

Speaking to a crowd of about 250 at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto Congregation, he accused Rabin of implementing "wrong policies" — which he said can only be changed by the Israeli public within the democratic process.

"If we want to survive, it will not suffice to be nice and to behave wonderfully. We have to be strong, but not at the expense of justice," said Meridor, considered a Likud insider.

Keeping Israel strong — not just militarily but economically and socially — is key, he said, because as Israel gets stronger over the years, Arab states get weaker and more divided.

That disparity has forced Arab states, "one by one," to come to grips with Israel and realize the Jewish state cannot be defeated.

It has also forced peace — first with Egypt, then with Jordan and the PLO, although the deal with the latter is fraught with problems, Meridor said.

For one, PLO leader Yasser Arafat has still not changed his organization's charter, which calls for Israel's destruction. And the Palestinian Authority in Gaza is not extraditing suspected terrorists to Israel, as called for in the Olso accords.

If the Likud wins next autumn's election, it cannot rip up the agreement with the PLO any more than Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak can invalidate the peace treaty with Israel because it was signed by his predecessor, Meridor said.

Positive track

He said that although he's not very optimistic in the short run, "in the long run, we are on the positive track to peace."

That sentiment is tempered, though, because "the image of a strong Israel may be reversed by reverting to the pre-1967 borders."

Meridor said the "most important thing" on Israel's agenda is the absorption of immigrants, while "the one thing more dangerous than total withdrawal [from conquered territory] is a Jewish civil war."

His talk was sponsored by the synagogue and United Jewish Appeal.

Commentators apologize for remarks

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A second radio commentator in less than a week has landed in hot water after rushing to the defence of a colleague who blamed the Legal Aid crisis on Jewish lawyers.

In a radio broadcast last week, CFTR commentator Dick Smyth agreed with CHUM's Brian Henderson that "there indeed is a disproportionate number of Jewish lawyers, dentists and doctors."

CFTR quickly condemned Smyth's remarks. Sandy Sanderson, general manager of 680 News (CFTR), called Smyth "dead wrong" and said his statement was "totally without any basis."

John Hinnen, executive editor of 680 News, read a repudiation of Smyth's remarks on the air, saying they were comments "with which the management of this radio station vehemently disagrees."

And after a few days, Smyth issued an on-air apology, saying he never intended to endorse "the concept that the mothers of Jewish lawyers were the root cause of our Legal Aid difficulties."

Smyth also said he regrets using the word "disproportionate."

Adding to the series of retractions, Henderson went on the air a day later and apologized for his remarks. "My attempt to preface a serious topic with a not-so-subtle bit of ethnic humor was clearly poorly conceived because it was not only misunderstood ... but created an atmosphere of ill-will and mistrust," he said.

In the commentary that sparked the controversy, Smyth said Henderson spoke some "rash but nevertheless true words. A quick inspection of the Toronto phone book reveals there indeed is a disproportionate number of Jewish lawyers dentists and doctors. In many cases their profession is the result of family pressure."

A few days before Smyth aired his comments, Henderson said Jewish mothers pushed their children into becomming lawyers and that Jewish lawyers were responsible for the Legal Aid crisis.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) immediately condemned Smyth's remarks. Congress spokesperson Manuel Prutschi called them "blatantly bigoted and anti-Semitic."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of BBC, said "Smyth has resorted to blatant anti-Semitism ... He is fostering and supporting negative stereotypes about Jews."

Smyth "uses the word 'disproportionate,' which is loaded with negative connotations, in the sense of too many," Prutschi said. "The question one is led to ask is, 'How many is too many?' Maybe the answer being invited is 'None is too many.' "

Prutschi said Congress welcomed the station's repudiation of Smyth's remarks as well as Smyth's apology.

Congress has also written to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) pointing out that Henderson's earlier remarks have had "a ripple effect" and should be treated as a serious matter.

Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region, wrote to Ontario rabbis reminding them of the incidents and suggesting they address them during the High Holiday season.

Sadness must yield

Probably no prayer in the entire body of Jewish liturgy stirs as many feelings or evokes as many images as Kol Nidre. It begins the evening service, the only one of the year during which prayer shawls are worn. It is recited three times in the presence of the largest congregation of the year. All the Torah scrolls are removed from the Ark and held closely, tightly, by worshippers who stand alongside the chazzan's table. In both eastern and western tradition, its haunting, deeply melancholy but very familiar strains are immediately recognizable and immediately joined by all worshippers, whether pious or not. It is mournful but also comforting. It is a lament and a reverie. It is a record of our history and a clarion for the days to come. It is the true musical and emotional complement to the sighs and the wails of the shofar's crying sounds. Sadness is an appropriate response.

But any sadness in our prayer and despair in our hearts must ultimately yield to resolve. For, as Rabbi Pinchas Brumer of Toronto teaches: "No one has the right to despair totally." Despair immobilizes; it prevents man from doing the vital work of improving the world.

The vows and the promises which Kol Nidre purports to nullify pertain only to our promises to God. It absolves no vows we may have made to our fellow human beings. These unfulfilled obligations remain fully intact and in force. Until we have completed improving the world, this is as it should be.

May the coming year bring us closer to completing this vital work, and may we all be inscribed for a good year of health and peace.

No partnership

As we wrote last week in an editorial concerning certain comments made by Marcel Masse, president of the Conseil de la Langue Française, some separatists have sharpened their debating swords to a very nasty edge. In his case, it was jagged with xenophobic, ethnic discrimination. But he mainly wounded himself and his cause.

Other separatist leaders, most notably Premier Jacques Parizeau himself, sweep their blade with a wide swath of delusion almost bordering on deceit. No one doubts the sincerity of his belief in the viability of a separate Quebec. But some of the arguments he urges upon Quebecers are disingenuous and fool no one. Let us examine, for example, his claim that a separate Quebec will be able to enter into a broad, economic partnership with a newly reconfigured Canada.

In an article in the Globe and Mail on August 24, Jeffrey Simpson offered at least eight reasons why an association or partnership between Quebec and the rest of Canada will not occur. The most compelling reason, however, is the one he described as psychological. "Canadians, having watched their country split and its influence in the world diminished, would hardly be in any frame of mind to cut some special deal with Quebec," he wrote.

The premiers of the other provinces have categorically confirmed this. Premier Roy Romanow of Saskatchewan called Parizeau's promise of preferential association "master illusion." Premier Clyde Wells of Newfoundland called it illogical.

Parizeau attempts to argue that, once the post-Yes vote trauma has subsided and the hurt feeling have mended, a partnership will develop because, after all, it will be in Canada's economic self-interest to negotiate and maintain one. This argument too is specious. As Wells observed, "Why would anyone suggest that the people of Canada would be prepared to accord a special status to a country that was not a province of Canada when it would not accord it to a province of Canada?"

Moreover, once the man-made, east-west political tie is severed, the natural, north-south economic forces will begin to exert themselves more strongly. As a "foreign market" competing with other foreign markets or Canadian trade, Quebec will not receive "most favored status", nor deserve it.

The consequence of political separation will be economic dissolution, not economic partnership. Parizeau mocks both the other premiers of Canada and the voters of Quebec when he claims the contrary.

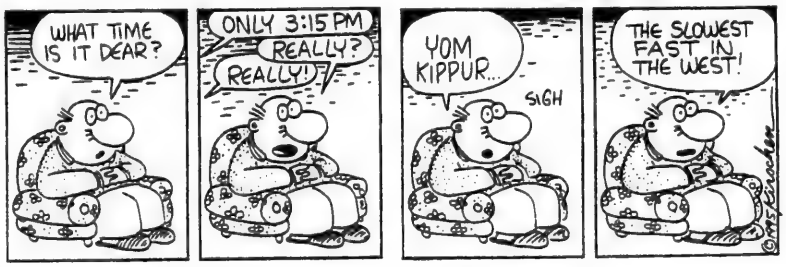
Dry Bones



CJN article finds genetic disease carriers

I am absolutely delighted to say that the Sept. 7 CJN article ferreted out one and possibly two additional Ashkenazi carriers of the Beta-Thalassemia genetic trait! Moreover, both families trace their roots to the general area of what today is northern Poland or Lithuania, the place where my ancestors lived. As usual, their physicians had not initially looked to Beta-Thalassemia as the cause for the anemia and, as a result, they were incorrectly prescribed doses of iron! There are others out there facing the same situation.

When you consider that publicity in a number of Jewish papers around the world and a year of networking on the Internet only turned up five other families who carry either Beta or Alpha-Thalassemia, you can appreciate how excited I am by the impact of The CJN article.

This is just the start. We now have to do some genealogical investigation and DNA work to determine if they carry the newly discovered mutation carried by my family, and thus further one of the principle objectives of the project.

There is only one regret. The family of carriers identified by the Toronto physician, and to which the article refers, has not contacted me. I am keeping my fingers crossed.

Reporting welfare cheats is not snitching

Very infrequently, I'm astounded to read an editorial in your pages that is completely inappropriate to represent any segment of the Canadian Jewish community. However, for the first time, I feel compelled to write to you to say that I, and some of my friends, are offended by your use of The CJN, representing the Canadian Jewish community, to disseminate the viewpoint in the editorial of Aug. 31, — "How Far Civic Duty?"

You claim that establishing a system, in Ontario, for detecting those crooks who are fraudulently obtaining welfare funds, will label all those who are receiving assistance as "cheaters and suspects." Apparently, you prefer to continue to permit the fraudulant to siphon off funds for themselves, that we critically require for the truly needy.

Actually, with a system in place that catches the criminal, welfare rip-off artists, those numerous allegations of welfare fraud that circulate in the community will be challenged to report the miscreants to the authorities or shut up, and the public will be satisfied that those who continue to receive assistance deserve our sympathy and support.

Unless you condemn Neighborhood Watch, and police TIPS informers, as snitches, don't condemn the system of "snitching," as you childishly refer to it, on welfare recipient frauds.

Refugees from Israel not legitimate

You report that for the second time in less than a year the Federal Court of Canada has rejected a claim by a Russian emigre for refugee status. The very thought that there could be one legitimate refugee from the State of Israel is simply preposterous. That the Canadian IRB tribunal would confer refugee status on 67 Israelis out of 238 applicants in the first six months of 1995 is outrageous. Refugee status is granted where there is state sponsored persecution and not an inability to get along with one's neighbors or employer. Israel is replete with the same democratic institutions, free access to the courts, human rights commissions and an ombudsman that exist in Canada and the United States. In fact, Canada is the only country in the world that has allowed a refugee from the State of Israel.

There is a second consideration which is particularly galling to those of us who fought long and hard to insure that Jews in the former Soviet Union were able to escape from behind the Iron Curtain and settle in Israel. For those who then turned around by and large for purely economic reasons and spit in the face of Israeli hospitality and defamed the very institutions that enabled them to get to Israel in the first place is particularly painful to witness.

Certain members of the IRB are very much in need of some basic instructions so that they can discharge their responsibilities in determining legitimate convention refugees and knowing the difference between a democratic state, a totalitarian regime and a banana republic.

Unlock the millions in Swiss banks

There have recently been reports that Swiss banks have finally agreed to acknowledge holding funds and assets deposited by Jews and doubtless non-Jews too, seeking to escape from Hitler's clutches in the '30s.

Swiss banks say they hold a mere few million but this is most absurd when some Jews managed to get out of Germany in time to take individual fortunes of such sums.

Germany today acknowledges that six million were killed by the Nazis, many who managed to get their valuables out in time to a neighboring country.

For example: I have a son-in-law whose parents perished in the Holocaust and he remembers as a child how they put a huge sum in a branch of a Swiss bank in Belgium and left information with a relative who also perished.

It would be a good idea if there could be a central registry for all survivors to report what they can recall of friends or family making such deposits and where possible, names of banks and branches and cities.

Maybe governments, in an effort to have justice finally done, could get banks to list names and details of those secret account dormant since Hitler's days for heirs to prove rights to be repaid.

Accounting for Yom Kippur's power

By DR. VIVIAN RAKOFF

On Yom Kippur we witness the curious spectacle of ordinary Jews, neither more nor less virtuous than one could expect in a relatively decent society, repeatedly confessing to behaviors such as deceit, slander, theft and malicious gossip. They judge themselves and make these admissions, voluntarily and in public out of internal need.

Their transgressions are not recorded in the police registers. They haven't been charged, let alone found guilty. True, the verbal form of the confession is in the plural and the contrition can also be seen as contrition on behalf of the community; but the words come out of individual mouths.

If they are pious or just vaguely traditional, they move their fists against their breasts in an attenuated gesture of punishment. For many, at a certain point in the day arrived at through a combination of lowered blood sugar, the repetitions of ritual and the focused concentration on the inner life, the hyperbolic catalogue of transgression acquires some of the reality of our more guilty dreams.

In the arena of the dream world, or the focused theatre of religious ceremony, it is enough that we have had fantasies of such things. And in the symbolically charged atmosphere of the Yom Kippur service, our wrong-doing is wrong-doing within an alternate reality.

At the end of the day of confession, contrition and memory, many people feel genuinely lightened, freshened, as they go off to celebrations and parties.

None of this makes rational sense if one applies the hard-nosed standards of, say, a business life. To make sense of these ceremonies in our secular, economically driven world, we need to accept that there is a domain of existence of great importance to us, one very different from our workday lives. One of the achievements of Freud and his followers, was to accept rationally the power of the irrational.

But long before Freud, Aristotle wrote about the mysterious power of tragedies to engage rapt attention and to cleanse the audience, calling the intense, often painful pouring out of emotions on the stage and in the minds of the audience, catharsis. At the end of a day of three tragedies and a kind of "Ne'ilah" (concluding piece), people also felt renewed and cleansed, "purged" as Aristotle wrote "by pity and terror."

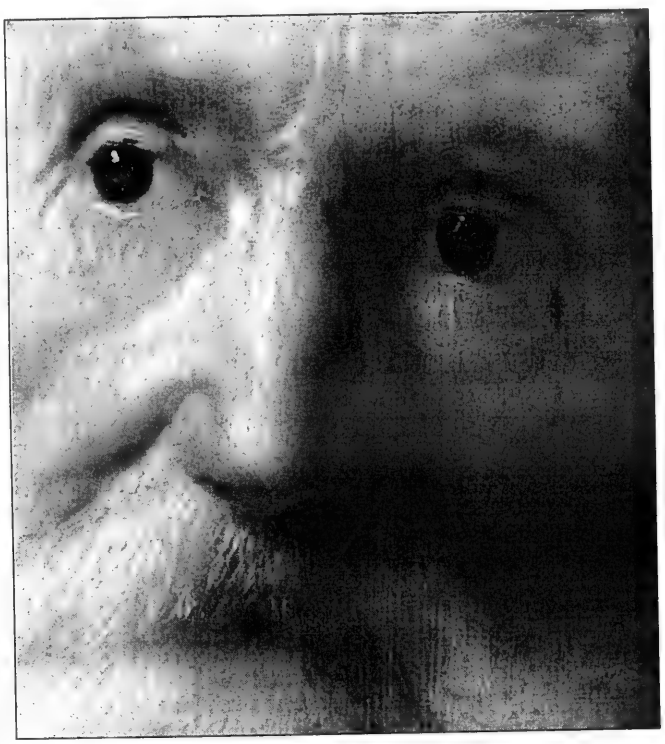
The horrors of Greek tragedies are similar to the list of crimes recited by a Yom Kippur congregation — and then some! They are records of hatred, lies and murder, all taking place under the eyes of the gods. The tragedies were religious ceremonies that tapped a dark stream of barely conscious experience in the service of much the same things that the Yom Kippur confessional does. They relieved the individual dis-ease.

And, as significantly, they bonded the audience/congregation into a believing community that shared a common view of the world. And the hovering presence of the gods removed the terrible curse of frivolity from daily action.

Life was given meaning within a context of the transcendental and the question that haunts us all — "Why bother?" — was given a non-rational and mysterious answer: Individual lives are important because they are enacted under a huge transcendental canopy. The "meaning" of pain and suffering may remain obscure, but we are left with an inner conviction that ultimately we, our brief lives, our silliness, malice and indeed wrong-doing do have meaning. Our actions are significant.

Whether we will it or not, the brain, the mind — whatever we call the inner engine of our psychological life — is constantly at work throughout our lives. It seems to have at least two modes of processing experience which run parallel with one another. The one is the clear, easily accessible stuff of the day to day. The other is more formless, slippery and dark. And both place demands on us, and have their dangers and their satisfactions. We cannot escape them.

Conscious experience is governed mainly by what the psychoanalysts have called, "secondary process thinking." Things are, more or less, what they appear to be. Thought processes are more or less logical, categories are more or less clear. By contrast, the pre-conscious or unconscious mental workings are governed by "primary process thinking." Time is compressed, separate events are blended, categories are fractured and re-combined in unusual ways.



The man's eyes, clear but somehow melancholy, seem focussed on a point far off on the horizon of his life. They starkly convey the dimension of contrition which is the heart of Yom Kippur and which, as Dr. Rakoff writes, can elevate a person "to a different plane of existence". (The painting is Bust of an Old Man by Jan Lievens)

During the day, we feel we have some control over the thoughts and feelings which are the substance of our awareness of ourselves. And we do have some control. Quite apart from our own awareness there is so much competition from the surrounding world that our internal focus is diluted or modified by the buzz and confusion of our surroundings: The car radio, the phone, the traffic, the job, our appetites. And for the most part we cope, or even better, we create and achieve.

But at night, when the interfering feedback of the world is subdued, the parallel life takes over and almost fills the stage of awareness and preoccupation. It happens most powerfully during dreams when we lie with our voluntary muscles paralysed and our brains in a state of intense activity, generating vivid, fully-experienced, fragmented narratives. When we are worried, a similar, dreamless state prevails in our tormented half-sleep when we lie tossing and turning. It is less so, but still operating, when we pace with the comforting glass of warm, sleep-inducing milk (or, God forbid, whisky) in the kitchen at 3 a.m.

In dreams, or in the near-delusional waking anxiety of that time which Scott Fitzgerald called "the dark night of the soul," we are busy solving and sorting out our magnified and distorted conflicts and tensions. Conflicts and tensions are an attribute as common to humankind as the commonly shared facts of anatomy and physiology. (I am not writing here about the terrible agony of depression as an illness when the normal doubts and fears are magnified to unbearable proportions.)

None of us in our own judgement is good enough, kind enough, honest enough or achieving enough. And at night, there are the monsters and inchoate terror that we have hatched from a blend of our long-term histories and the day's experience. Every night, we "purge" our minds of what we cannot usefully maintain. It is as though in dreams we enact a physiological process of expiation through terror and forgiveness, a bodily catharsis. When we wake, we can then go on. Every dawning presents the comfortable illusion of a fresh start.

Our inevitable and inescapable sense of fallibility derives from all the authorities of our lives, parents, family, community standards, the laws of God and the state. Freud clumped all these forces into the irrational, excessively demanding super-ego which speaks for the voice of conscience in the unconscious.

Some philosophers argue that our moral sense is not imposed externally, but springs from the essential structure of our minds. In modern computer language terms, they say we are moral because morality is encoded into the hard disc of human endowment. Anthropologists have tried to divide societies into those that induce either shame or guilt, to separate the major mechanisms by means of which individuals in any given society are socialized into orderly, law-abiding citizens. But shame and guilt are Siamese twins and to truly separate them requires theoretical contortions, which however ingenious they are, have a way of collapsing at the edges so that the two entities bleed into one another.

Occasionally, our sense of transgression is rational and warranted. People do run traffic lights, steal, embezzle, rob and do terrible things. Sometimes such acts seem to be the major preoccupations of the media. (Newspapers, movies and television are to an extraordinary degree carriers of a vision of the world as a lust-driven, power crazy, greedy amoral cesspit.)

But for most of us, most of the time, such real sinning is simply not characteristic of our lives. The view from your window, wherever it is, is most unlikely to reveal a murder, a fire, an accident, a rape or a robbery. Overt criminality is less common than ordinary decent behavior. Yet we ordinary "good" folk need relief from the accumulation of guilt which seems to be our sadly normal fate, some powerful mechanism which will deal at the level of the symbol with our sense of accumulated wrong-doings, something which will allow us to carry on, which will make sense of our days.

How else can we account for the power of Yom Kippur? The secular, the vaguely affiliated, the shul-once-a-year (excluding weddings and bar mitzvahs) among us pack the usually near-empty spaces: synagogues, shtiebels, day school gymnasiums. The casual or the late-comers can't get tickets. It's as though some great entertainment is being offered instead of a painful, memory laden self-accusatory ceremony of trial and deprivation. Why? The religious don't need any subtle answer. For them its simple: It is written and the prescribed behavior is followed because it is prescribed. But for the rest of us — the majority of us — it is more subtle.

Yes, there is a sense of belonging which is affirmed by being with a congregation, vague habit, nostalgia and of course, Yizkor. But Yizkor is only part of Yom Kippur and not its central part (even though after Yizkor most non-Orthodox shuls almost empty — the day's work done). The core remains the hope that, in ways we can't fully articulate, we will be relieved of a messy oppressive burden of inchoate guilt and shame. But at a more significant level, we take part in a huge drama of redemption during which we are — if even for a moment — elevated to a different plane of existence.

The modern industrial societies are good at satisfying the needs of the conscious side of our lives. This century is full of failed secular attempts to aggrandize existence with social and political myths. New men are offered and new societies have promised something like the transcendental. But each in turn has failed. We witness the odd flourishing of partial causes — good causes — entering into the fervor and total myth-systems of major religions. The latest is probably "the environment."

But we continue to need sense-making myths which take away our "cosmic" loneliness. They need to be part of personal and group history. In that sense, Yom Kippur encapsulates, even for the secular, the desire for a meaningful life.

Terror and glory on Yom Kippur

By Jack Chisvin

I was but a child then, understanding little of the significance of the kapporot ceremony, but vaguely realizing that what was taking place was somehow connected to the mysticism which shrouds Yom Kippur.

That morning, my mother enters the chicken coop to select five birds, three cocks and two hens. As generally happens when a human enters, the coop becomes a throbbing clamor of clucking and crowing as the excited chickens begin to run and fly in all directions. Gradually, the embattled uproar grows quieter and my mother spots a bird which is destined to be a kapporah. She circles around it, never taking her eye off it, the bird becomes entranced and lies motionless, she squats down before it and with lightning speed seizes it by the leg. The bird tries to wrench itself free, shaking and shrieking, but it is no match for my mother. Soon its legs are tied and its fate is sealed.

The house is full of noise. The frightened and bewildered fowl are upraised and the rite begins. We rotate the birds nine times about the head reciting together, "This is instead of me, this is an offering on my account, this is in expiation for me; this cock (or hen) shall be assigned to death and may I enter a long and healthy life." I mouth the incantation, but I am otherwise engaged in the thought that the fowl might befoul my head.

We carry the birds to the shochet across the street. I recoil when from the folds of the shochet's coat a long knife flashes. He throws the birds to the ground where they lie to cool. Rivulets of blood run from their necks, spattering their white feathers.

The misbegotten chickens are served the next day for the last meal before the fast — chicken soup with kreplach, boiled chicken, carrot tzimmes and lokshen kugel. I wonder in my childish way if the biblical imperative to fast is a catharsis for eating the kapporah.

The yahrzeit candles are lit. My mother piously blesses her candles. Gut yom tov my parents greet each other and kiss tenderly. Gut yom tov children, and we in turn receive a loving kiss. We hasten off to shul, we dare not be late for Kol Nidre.

The shul is a shtiebl, a modest wooden frame building, but neither the vast vaults of Notre Dame nor the soaring dome of St. Peter's was ever filled with a more impressive inner radiance. It is an allegory of colors and rhythms. Candles glow everywhere. Lamps and pendant candelabra gleam overhead scattering speckled light on the crowded congregation.

The chazzan begins to chant Kol Nidre, but not alone. The worshippers join in with a wordless exalted melody. A sense of solemnity and sadness pervades, arousing the deep hidden religious feelings and longings of humankind.

Now, the lower men's section is a surging sea of white tallesim. The tallesim bend, sway, move upward, turn side to side. The tallesim plead, pray, moan. The women in the balcony take their cue from the men. They sob, wail, implore, hands stretched upward, as if asking the ceiling to open so they can ascend to heaven.

In the morning, we return to shul early. I remain outside to play nut games with the boys. Some have apples and some have honey cake to eat, but all have pockets well stocked with hazel nuts — it is going to be a long day. From time to time I call in on my parents. Sour breath and the odors of unwashed bodies hang in the heavy air. The women's section is a dirge of stifled weeping, sighs and lamentations. Many have little vials of ammonia which they dab on tear-soaked handkerchiefs clutched in their hands.

The sun is setting and shadows begin to fall. Stars punctuate the darkening sky. The Neilah service is underway. The congregation stands, weakened from the long fast and arduous prayers. This is the end. In a moment the gates will close. The shofar, as a musical instrument an unfortunate invention, sounds one long resounding tekiah with primitive ferocity. Yom Kippur is over — we made it for another year.

My children and grandchildren will never know a past that is no more — the terror and the glory of my world on Yom Kippur as I was growing up in the shtetl incarnate that was the north end of Winnipeg.

Jonah and the great fish

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

With Yom Kippur approaching, I wonder how many people have ever given thought to the question of why the story of Jonah is an important part of the day's liturgy.

You are, of course, familiar with the tale, which forms a complete "book" in our Bible. Jonah, a prophet, is asked by God to travel to Nineveh in Mesopotamia and there preach to the people, tell them that because of their sins their city will be destroyed by God. For reasons of his own, Jonah decides to flee from the Divine call and tries to get as far away from his native land as possible. He takes a boat from Jaffa, is thrown overboard by the crew during a violent storm which God has brought about, and is swallowed by a great fish (which popular tradition made into a whale). Jonah prays, is spewed out on to land, proceeds to Nineveh, and when the people hear his message, they repent and God forgives them. In the process, Jonah plays a less than heroic role.

It is to all appearances a very simple story; yet the discussions of what exactly the book means to tell us are endless. Large tomes have been written about it, and it might interest you to hear some of the theories. Here are some of the many interpretations:

It is a story which was composed in the fifth century BCE in order to oppose the nationalistic policies of Ezra. The gentile sailors and the people of Nineveh, too, are open to the word of the universal God.

The midrash makes a hero out of Jonah by suggesting that his motivation was to protect the good name of Israel. He knew that if he announced the destruction of Nineveh there would be immediate repentance, which in turn would cause God to reverse the decree. In consequence, Jonah and his people would be seen as foolish and Israelite prophecy would be held in low esteem by other nations.

The book stresses Divine forgiveness when sinners repent sincerely. It proclaims the same theme as does Yom Kippur and therefore is read to the congregation at afternoon services.

The book stresses the paradoxical nature of prophecy. The prophet foretells God's severe judgement, but if people listen and act accordingly, the prophecy will not be fulfilled.

Justice and mercy are always complementary. Divine forgiveness does not demonstrate God's weakness, even though the sinner is not punished as God's own law demands.

Most likely several of these themes enter the composition of the work and have made it into a prism — as one holds it up to the light, it refracts in varying colors. Like the story itself, one is left with a question rather than with the answer and in fact, the book ends with a question. That in itself adds to the eternal attraction of the book.

So, come Yom Kippur afternoon you might consider these interpretations. Meanwhile, I wish you a good fast.

Ensuring a bright Jewish future

By Lori Binder

The first time I wrote an article for The Canadian Jewish News was last March, at the end of the university year. It is fitting that I am writing my second article not only at the onset of a new school year, but also at the beginnning of a new year in the Jewish calendar.

This time of year for many is a solemn period of awakening, as they prepare for the days of Judgment and Atonement. However, we must also realize that this time of year is a time of celebration of a new Jewish year and a new beginning.

CAMPUS VOICES

The new school year not only marks a heavy workload for students, but also a time to get back into campus life after the summer vacation. Jewish student organizations across the country have begun to offer programming to students starting back into courses.

We must celebrate the work of these local organizations who undertake this difficult task of offering Jewish resources and programming to a population whose time is a premium. We must also celebrate the involvement of student leaders who volunteer their time to make this much needed programming a success. Their initiatives and hard work contribute greatly to the Jewish dynamics of our community.

As I reflect on this past year I find numerous reasons to celebrate. The community is continuing to successfully fulfil its new initiative of working with the student community. On a personal level, I have been able to become more closely involved with my community here in Winnipeg and thus learn more about it and contribute to it.

Programs for students by students

I have seen the Jewish Student Association in Winnipeg grow over the past three years to become the success it is today, thanks to our community, which has enabled the organization and the students to provide a variety of programs to an increasing number of students.

On a national level, I have witnessed an ongoing effort to develop future leaders for the Jewish community. As an executive member of the Jewish Students' Network, I have seen organizations demonstrate their belief in student efforts and allow students to give back to their community.

Network, as the only national Jewish student organization in Canada, has reason to celebrate. We are taking some new directions based on the needs and advice given by student and organizational leaders. We have begun to integrate with both community organizations and student groups to work together in establishing goals and programming for the future. This has allowed us to rejoice in the feeling of connectedness and sharing. Only through working together will we be able to feel like Am Echad, one Nation.

Network is celebrating its 18th birthday this year. For 18 years, Jewish students in Canada have been given the opportunity to provide and run programs for students by students. Network has not only been able to educate students through its diverse programming and resources, it has also become actively involved in many community projects such as Operation Exodus and leadership development. There are many Network alumni that have become active leaders in the North American Jewish community as well as in Israel. Of this we should be proud.

We must learn from our successes so that we can continue to grow and keep in mind what we must continue to do. As an advocate for my fellow Jewish students, I feel it is imperative that Jewish students be seen as whole members of the community. Together we will share the benefits of this effort and our community will continue to grow,

I hope we will all begin to realize what we have accomplished and rejoice in our contribution to furthering our Jewish community. Too often we only see how far we have to go, rather than how far we've come. As a message to my fellow students across the country, may this new year allow us to reach further and achieve more than we ever dreamed possible. Together we will ensure a bright Jewish future. Shanah Tovah.

Lori Binder is presently in her final year of Education at the University of Manitoba, majoring in Judaic Studies. She is the Western regional chair of the Jewish Students' Network and an executive member of the Jewish Students' Association of Winnipeg.

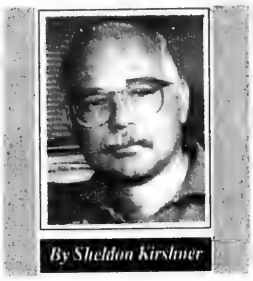
Festival films explore the Jewish condition



This year's Toronto International Film Festival, which ended on Sept. 16, was the cultural event of the month. Aficionados had 298 films from which to choose, and several, hardly enough in a festival of this magnitude, turned on Jewish themes.

Under the Domim Tree (Etz Hadomim Tafus) is the sequel to the The Summer of Aviya (1988), the deservedly acclaimed biographical film which drew its sustenance from the poignant relationship between a woman who had lost her family in the Holocaust and her sensitive daughter, Aviya.

Eli Cohen's film, which is based on a novel by Israeli actress Gila Almagor and set in a youth village in 1953, focuses on a group of displaced teenagers who have lived through and have been scarred by the Holocaust.

It's a terrific film — one of the finest to emerge from Israel. Touching without being maudlin, and distinguished by first-rate performances from an ensemble of virtually unknown actors, it works its magic effortlessly.

Its strength lies in its ability to breathe life into a varied cast of characters, the majority of whom are orphans who haven't given up the search for their presumably murdered parents.

Aviya (Kaipo Cohen), a female lead in The Summer of Aviya, shares their pain and sense of loss because she, too, has been affected by the Holocaust. Aviya's mute mother (Almagor, in a cameo role) is confined to an institution, while the whereabouts of her father, the source of Aviya's obsession, has yet to be established.

Buttressed by a moody musical score, the film builds momentum as Aviya's concerns intersect with those of the troubled teens in her midst.

There is Yurek (Ohad Knoller), a Hollywood handsome boy who is gradually drawn to Aviya; there is Yola (Orli Pearl), whose dream of being reunited with her parents in Poland is suddenly shattered; there is Mira (Riki Blich), who resists the blandishments of a couple claiming to be her parents; there is Sarah (no credit given), whose jealousy is ignited by Yurek's romantic interest in Aviya.

The movie is not flawless. Its metaphorical centrepiece, the domim tree under which the youngsters seek solace and solitude, seems contrived.

The sub-plot, the planting of a rose garden by a Dutch Zionist, is an apt metaphor for rebirth. It comes off beautifully.

"I want to go on living after my death," Anne Frank, the remarkable diarist, wrote presciently before she was betrayed and consigned to an untimely death.

She need not have worried. Fifty years after she perished of malnutrition and disease in Bergen-Belsen, Anne Frank is arguably the best-known victim of the Holocaust, an enduring symbol of its horrors.

Her diary, which she began at the age of 13, has been published in 54 languages in 25 million copies since it was released in 1947. And the stage adaptation of The Diary of Anne Frank, which won the Pulitzer Prize, was made into a Hollywood movie in 1959.

In addition, Anne Frank — one of the 1.5 million Jewish children who are estimated to have died in the Holocaust — has been the subject of documentaries, books, articles and monographs.

The newest entry, Jon Blair's documentary, Anne Frank Remembered, may well be the definitive eulogy of this Dutch martyr. Blair's movie is a skillfully assembled amalgam of personal testimony, archival footage (including a never-before-seen film clip of Anne), letters and excerpts from her diary narrated by actors Kenneth Branagh and Glenn Close. This solid documentary is both a rounded portrait of a maturing girl and a plea for tolerance in an intolerant universe.

The Anne Frank who emerges from this documentary is curious, intelligent, self-possessed, talkative and feisty.

As we know, Anne, who addressed her diary as Kitty, lived in a loft with her family for two years. Otto, her father, had prepared it in case of an emergency. The disaster presented itself in July 1942, when the Germans rounded up the Jews of Amsterdam.

Anne and Otto, though not her sister Margot and her mother Edith, adapted quickly to their hiding place in the secret annex over Otto's business establishment.

Theirs was a grim, claustrophobic, fearful existence, which they shared with four other Jews. Not surprisingly, tension was in the air. Anne, for example, disliked one of the boarders, Fritz Pfeffer, a straitlaced dentist. Interestingly enough, Miep Gies — a Christian friend who supplied the Franks and their guests with food and information — claimed that Pfeffer was actually "a lovely, lovely man."

Blair's film, which is never less than riveting, goes on to explore Anne's poor relationship with her mother, her brief romantic idyl with 17-year-old Peter Van Pels, the manner in which her diary was saved and finally published, and the adulation that has been showered on her since then.

An exceptional piece of work.

My Mother's Courage, which had its world premiere in Toronto, is a rarity: a Holocaust film sprinkled with moments of levity .

Based on a novel by George Tabori, it is directed by Michael Verhoeven (The Nasty Girl), a German filmmaker with a highly honed penchant for mining the humor of an otherwise black situation.

Budapest in the summer of 1944 was a catastrophic time for its Jewish residents. The Nazi deportations had begun in the hinterland, and the Jews of the Hungarian capital, including Tabori's parents, were next in line for oblivion. Tabori himself, was safely ensconced in London as the calamity loomed.

By then, Tabori's father — a philandering newspaper editor — had already lost his job and been arrested. Yet his mother, Elsa, an eternal optimist, seemed blissfully and naively ignorant of the approaching cataclysm.

Starring the British actress Pauline Collins as Elsa, My Mother's Courage essentially unfolds through her eyes and those of Tabori, who acts as an on-screen muse.

You immediately know that this film will be different when it pokes malicious fun at the clumsy, sartorially-inept Hungarian policemen who arrive to arrest Tabori's father and, later, his mother.

Once these mildly amusing Keystone Kops scenes fade away, the tone changes drastically, and My Mother's Courage takes on most of the trappings of a conventional Holocaust film.

The mood is one of doom as a grimy train station fills to overflowing with Jews who are under the impression that nothing is amiss. The sense of desperation builds as random beatings, humiliations, a rape and a murder, some conveyed in flashbacks, take place.

The climax occurs when an SS officer in charge of the Auschwitz-bound train miraculously spares Elsa's life, thus confirming her faith in human decency. But this Schindler-like gesture hardly absolves the murderers of their crimes, a theme which is at the core of Verhoeven's at once sardonic and compassionate film.

SHORT TAKES:

Bombay, by Mani Rathnam, resounds to the themes of religious intolerance and communal violence. When a Hindu man and a Muslim woman in a remote village in India marry and raise a family, they encounter fierce resistance and fanaticism. The thin layer of civility of Indian society is easily torn asunder. Bombay is by turns pastoral, picturesque, campy and exceedingly powerful.

The Champagne Safari is George Ungar's fascinating study of Charles Bedaux, the mysterious, somewhat amoral Franco-American entrepreneur who developed an industrial concept which brought him immense wealth and who hobnobbed with Italian and German fascists, both before and during World War II. Was he a Nazi collaborator or simply a crass opportunist and profit-monger? Your guess is as good as mine.

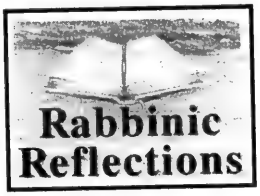
The chain of Jewish life



By
RABBI GEOFFREY J. HABER

There's an old legend about a splendid bird that lived in a tropical country. It was the most colorful of creatures, its plumage containing all the colors in the world. But its nest was situated at the top of a tree so tall that no one could ever hope to reach it.

When news of the bird came to the ears of a certain king, he appointed a number of people to bring it to him. They were to stand on one another's shoulders until someone could reach the bird. The people duly assembled near the tree, but while they were balancing on one another's shoulders, some of those on the bottom became bored and wandered off. As soon as the first component of this living ladder moved, the entire structure collapsed, injuring several people. As a result, the bird remained uncaptured and the king's desire remained unfulfilled.

The people failed the king in two ways. Not only did they fail to get the bird, but more important, the king's yearning to see his people united in a great undertaking went unfulfilled (Raskas, B., Heart of Wisdom, III:240).

In a Jewish context, this story reminds us that each Jew is important in the chain of Jewish life. If we stand together, hand in hand, with a shared commitment, we can reach new heights as a people. This in turn will give us courage and strength as individuals and as Jews. For the whole purpose of Judaism is to produce human beings who are responsible, loving and compassionate. Indeed, this is one of the fundamental lessons found in the Haftorah for Yom Kippur morning.

The Prophet Isaiah speaks out about our complacency and asks us to think about why we fast on Yom Kippur day: "Why have we fasted if You do not see it?" Isaiah asks of God. "Why have we afflicted ourselves [O God], if You do not acknowledge it?" Isaiah answers his own question by challenging us.

He says, "Behold, on the day of your fast you pursue business as usual and oppress your workers. Behold, you fast only to quarrel and fight, to deal wicked blows. Such fasting will not make your voice audible on high" (Isaiah 58:3-4).

If we fast this day, and then go about our business as though nothing happened, then our fast is worthless, says Isaiah. If we fast this day and are not moved to greater sensitivity about the needs of one another or to be compassionate or cooperative with one another, then fasting is meaningless. The prophet tells us that if we pay lip service to the holy day but do not think about its meaning or let it affect our lives, then we missed the purpose of the fast.

The purpose of the fast, as Isaiah says, is not solely affliction of the soul or personal discomfort. It is supposed to move us from our complacency and encourage us to take responsibility for our actions and for the well-being of others. "This is my chosen fast: To loosen all the bonds that bind men unfairly, to let the opposed go free, to break every yoke. Share your bread with the hungry, take the homeless into your home, clothe the naked when you see him, do not turn away from people in need ... Then you shall call and the Lord will answer, you shall cry out and He will say 'Here I am' " (Isaiah 58:6-7, 9).

What God wants from us this Yom Kippur day is to be responsible for our fellow human beings, to work together to create a peaceful and harmonious community. The Talmud puts it succinctly like this: "All Israel is responsible for one another."

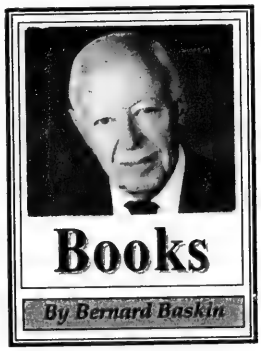
Books can serve as candles in the dark



Through the long ages, the Jew has been a faithful patron of literature. He always owned and treasured the written word. If perchance he dropped a volume, he picked it up and kissed it. If he handed someone a book, he did so respectfully, and with his right hand. The mitzvah of pidyon shevuim (ransoming human captives) was equated with pidyon se'forim (redeeming books) purloined by bandits who periodically swooped down to plunder Jewish settlements. These marauders knew that, no matter how indigent a community might be, its members would manage somehow to collect funds for the recovery of their literary treasures.

Jewish oppressors vented their hatred not only against human beings, but also against books. In this way both body and soul became victims. From the 13th to the 19th centuries, frightful holocausts against Jewish books were the rule rather than the exception. Ghettos were raided, Jewish homes were pillaged, synagogues were plundered, libraries were looted; their books were consigned to the pyre.

Zealous as he was for preserving the integrity of his faith, the worst punishment the Jew could devise for heretical volumes was to brand them as seforim hitsonim (apocryphal or outside books). These were to be kept in isolation and even hidden but not to be destroyed.

The Nazis gleefully consigned books to huge bonfires. At least eight million volumes went up in flames before a reversal in Nazi policy led to confiscation rather than destruction. After Germany's defeat, the victorious Allies recovered thousands of volumes. Vast numbers, however, were irrevocably lost.

The Jewish literary map is expansive in time, in space and in language. Rabbi Alan Steinbach reminds us that "Philo wrote his philosophical treaties in Alexandria, Egypt, in the Greek tongue; Josephus' works were penned in Rome, also in Greek. Solomon ibn Gabirol wrote his principal philosophical works in Arabic, in Spain. Maimonides wrote his Guide for the Perplexed in Cairo, in Arabic.

"Judah Halevi's Kusari was written in Arabic, in Spain. Moses Mendelssohn's Phaedon was penned in Germany, in classical German. Glueckel von Hamelin's Memoirs appeared in Hanover, Germany, in the Judeo-German of the time. Israel Zangwill wrote his Voice of Jerusalem and his novels in London, in English. Bialik's Hebrew poems were written in Odessa, Russia. H. Leivick wrote his collected poems I Was Not In Treblinka in New York City, in Yiddish. Edmund Fleg employed French for his poems, plays and novels. In Canada we have the poems of A. M. Klein, and it is hardly necessary to enumerate the galaxy of writers in Israel using the medium of Hebrew."

Jewish books continue to be published in unprecedented numbers, but it appears that readership is diminishing in a culture that is increasingly technological. Books, more and more, are what they use to make movies for television.

The New Year is the proper time for a positive resolution about reading. Listen to the words of Moses ibn Ezra (1070-1138): "A book is the most delightful companion ... An inanimate thing yet it talks ... it stimulates your latent talents. There is in the world no friend more faithful and attentive, no teacher more proficient ... it will join you in solitude, accompany you in exile, serve as a candle in the dark and entertain you in your loneliness. It will do you good and ask no favor in return."

Spying on welfare recipients 'inimical to my Judaism'

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Exerpted from Rabbi Marmur's sermon on Shabbat Ki Tetze.

When I was six and a fugitive in Soviet Russia, I was told by those in power to spy on others, including my parents, in order to save the country for Communism and to protect it from subversive elements.

GUEST VOICES

Now at 60, as a free citizen of democratic Canada and a resident of Ontario, I am about to be encouraged by the provincial government to spy on others, specifically welfare recipients, in order to save the province for capitalism and protect it from those who might abuse the system. I hope you are not surprised that I am somewhat traumatized by the prospect.

No, I am not comparing the Soviet Union in 1941 to Canada in 1995, but I am suggesting that, in both cases, I am called upon to do something that is fundamentally inimical to my Judaism. For to intrude into another person's realm, be it their thoughts — as in Soviet Russia — or their lifestyle — as in Ontario — is to violate them as human beings and trample on their dignity as God's creatures. Such intrusion is, indeed, legitimate in extreme criminal cases but, the circumstances cited here are of a fundamentally different order.

I would like to illustrate the immorality of spying on the poor by quoting from the sidrah Ki Tetze,

First: "When you make a loan of any sort to your neighbor, you must not enter his house or seize his pledge. You must remain outside, while the man to whom you made the loan brings the pledge out to you." In other words, a person's privacy is so fundamental that even if I have lent her or him money, I am not allowed to violate that privacy in order to claim what is legally mine. The fact that the person needed the money does not mean that his or her dignity should be diminished, and the fact that I provided the money does not entitle me to violate the borrower's rights.

The text goes on: "If he is a needy man, you shall not go to sleep in his pledge; you must return the pledge to him at sundown, that he may sleep in his cloth and bless you; and it will be to your merit before the Lord your God." If the collateral I have been given leaves the borrower out in the cold, I am not allowed to keep it, even though, technically, I may be entitled to it. Once again, human dignity comes before fiscal prudence, and compassion comes above all else.

Further: "You shall not abuse a needy and destitute laborer, whether a fellow countryman or a stranger in one of the communities of your land." This suggests that we are not allowed to abuse the poor, whether they are "our own" or newcomers — immigrants, refugees. Once they live in our midst, we are responsible for them; they are our neighbors.

Finally: "You shall not subvert the rights of the stranger or the fatherless; you shall not take a widow's garments in pawn. Remember you were a slave in Egypt and the Lord your God has redeemed you from there; therefore I enjoin you to observe this commandment." Being a Jew means having a special responsibility for the disadvantaged in the world, for all Jews have been there and know what it's like.

The statement about not humiliating the borrower, either by entering his house or keeping his pledge overnight, is obviously addressed not to governments, but to people sufficiently well off to be able to afford to lend. Next, the injunction against withholding the wages of laborers is naturally addressed to bosses, who hire laborers. And finally, the statement about not subverting the rights of the stranger or the fatherless is clearly intended for the privileged who have to be reminded that they, too, were once the underdog and that it is thanks to God that their lot has improved and, therefore, they — we — owe something to God and must repay it to God's creatures.

Unfortunately, there is much to suggest that these texts, when read today, no longer speak to most of those for whom they were intended. Too many of us identify with power, not with justice; with government, not with people. I surmise that some, perhaps many, members of our community applaud the measures now proposed by the Government of Ontario and will, therefore, regard what I am saying today as political and thus unfit for the pulpit.

Sadly, as Jews have gained more influence in society and have thus acquired new opportunities to articulate the teachings of their tradition, a growing number have chosen to judge social issues in terms of their own needs, not of the needs of others — the very opposite to what our texts teach us. The irony should not escape us.

I am not denying the possibility that some people cheat on welfare, and I solemnly affirm that it is wrong to do so. Nevertheless, the Jewish response to that would be, I surmise, that it is better to be cheated than to humiliate the cheater. The reason is theological, not political. Judaism, with its preoccupation with the human condition, knows that most of us cheat at some point in our lives — both each other and God.

Yes, we have to be judged for wrongs, but not at any cost, and not so that the punishment exceeds the crime. That's why God is Harachaman, the Merciful One, the forgiving God. To be religious is to imitate God. Here's an effective way of imitation: As God is merciful, so must we be; as God bids us to respect the downtrodden, so must we. To preserve human dignity and a society based on decency and trust is more important than to catch the odd cheater. It is the central theme in Judaism and its daughter-religions, it stands in stark and ominous contrast to paganism. That's why social justice is an interfaith issue.

Jews who abandon the cardinal principles of ethical monotheism by mistaking revenge for justice and oppression for fairness are in spiritual jeopardy, however fervent their manifestations of piety and however passionate their protestations of common sense.

My objections to snitching are on moral grounds. Based on the injunctions of God, I feel morally and religiously bound to protect the privacy of welfare recipients, the rights of refugees and the dignity of all powerless people, and I urge you most earnestly to do the same.

Rabbi Dow Marmur is the spiritual leader of the Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

The chain of Jewish life

[Cont'd. from page 12]

Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai tells a story illustrating this point. Once there was a man travelling by sea. He was observed drilling a hole under the seat where he was sitting. His fellow passengers asked what he was doing.

"It is no concern of yours, I am not drilling under your seat," he said.

"But," they protested, "when the water enters, the whole boat sinks. You will drown us all!"

Whether we go down with the ship or steam forward full speed ahead, whether we sink or swim, is not up to each of us but all collectively, Jewishly or otherwise, if we do not function together, consider the needs of others alongside our own and act meaningfully and responsively.

The foxhole mentality can never be a long-term route to success. Without the aid of the cavalry, the foxhole is soon overrun by the enemy. The king's attempt to capture the most beautiful bird in the world failed because people did not see themselves as a community with a common purpose and goal.

The Haftorah for Yom Kippur proclaims that so long as we do not see ourselves as a community striving for a common good, concerned about those less fortunate than ourselves and respecting those whose opinion differs from ours, then God's face will remain hidden from us and the world will not become a better place in which to live. Isaiah calls on us to work together to achieve our goals.

'War Room' braces for referendum

Federalist nerve centre

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — The 1980 Quebec referendum would probably have been lost by the federalist forces had it not been for Pierre Trudeau.

He arrived like a knight in shining armor and rescued a faltering federalist campaign, saving the day for Canada with three articulate, hard-hitting speeches that turned around what had been an almost sure separatist victory.

The federalists realized afterwards how lucky they were to win. Never mind that the final vote split 59 per cent to 40 per cent in their favor.

They determined that this time, without Trudeau to save them, they would have to be prepared as never before. They would have to match the separatists, organization for organization.

A little more than a year ago, a deal was struck between Daniel Johnson's forces in Quebec and Jean Chrétien's people in Ottawa.

The provincial Liberals would do the work on the ground in Quebec; the Ottawa Liberals, backed by the federal bureaucracy, would provide strategic planning, media help and operations monitoring.

Both teams solemnly promised they would work hand in glove with each other this time, and nobody would try to upstage anybody, nor let pride get in the way, as they did in 1980.

Ottawa set up a War Room, staffed by several dozen of the most trusted federal public servants, men and women whose loyalty to the cause of Canadian federalsim was unquestioned.

It was set up about a year ago, in a section of the Privy Council Office (PCO) known officially as the Intergovernmental Affairs Secretariat and assigned a budget of $2.5 million, about $1.4 million of it for salaries and $1 million for general operations. The federal government has been somewhat reticent to reveal details, but the money seems to have come out of a $6.3-million fund set aside for something called "government renewal."

The War Room occupies the eighth and ninth floors of a 23-storey government office building at 66 Slater St. in Ottawa, just behind the elegant, old Lord Elgin Hotel.

It is the nerve centre from which all referendum activity by federalists and separatists alike is monitored, recorded, filtered, analyzed and passed on to the politicians for immediate action.

Most of the 60 staffers came from the Privy Council Office or were borrowed from other government departments. About 24 of them are analysts, researchers and information officers. The others perform a variety of unspecified tasks the government prefers not to discuss.

The director of the War Room, who holds the prestigious title of deputy secretary (Intergovernmental Affairs) for the Privy Council Office, is a 45-year-old anglophone Montrealer, Howard Balloch, who came over after a flamboyant career in Foreign Affairs, where he had attracted Chrétien's attention when he helped organize the prime minister's trip to China last year.

With him are two PCO bureaucrats, Marc Lafrenière, an expert on aboriginal issues, and Michael Wernick, who knows constitutional issues.

Marie Gervais-Vidricaire, formerly with the Canadian Embassy in Paris, heads the strategic planning section, and Alain Darisse, on loan from Foreign Affairs, runs the communications section. James Hurley, another constitutional affairs expert, is also in the group.

Pierre Richard from National Defence is in charge of "special projects," which has led some Bloc Québécois MPs to speculate that the Canadian military may be playing a secret role in the referendum campaign.

Although they aren't strictly part of the operation, the prime minister's three top staff members, known as "the Montreal Mafia" are frequent visitors.

Chief of Staff Jean Pelletier, senior policy analyst Eddie Goldenberg, and director of policy and research Chaviva Hosek rely heavily on the War Room for information to pass on to the Prime Minister's Office.

The War Room is equipped with sophisticated media-monitoring devices, including a bank of automatic television monitors, radios and video recorders, and the most sophisticated telecommunications equipment. It is hooked up to a special "secure" government telephone and facsimile transmission network.

Within seconds of an item's appearing on television, the War Room is able to re-transmit it to any number of government offices in Ottawa or to the referendum campaign headquarters in Montreal.

It can send a high-speed fax directly into the lobby of the House of Commons and have it in the prime minister's hands in a matter of moments.

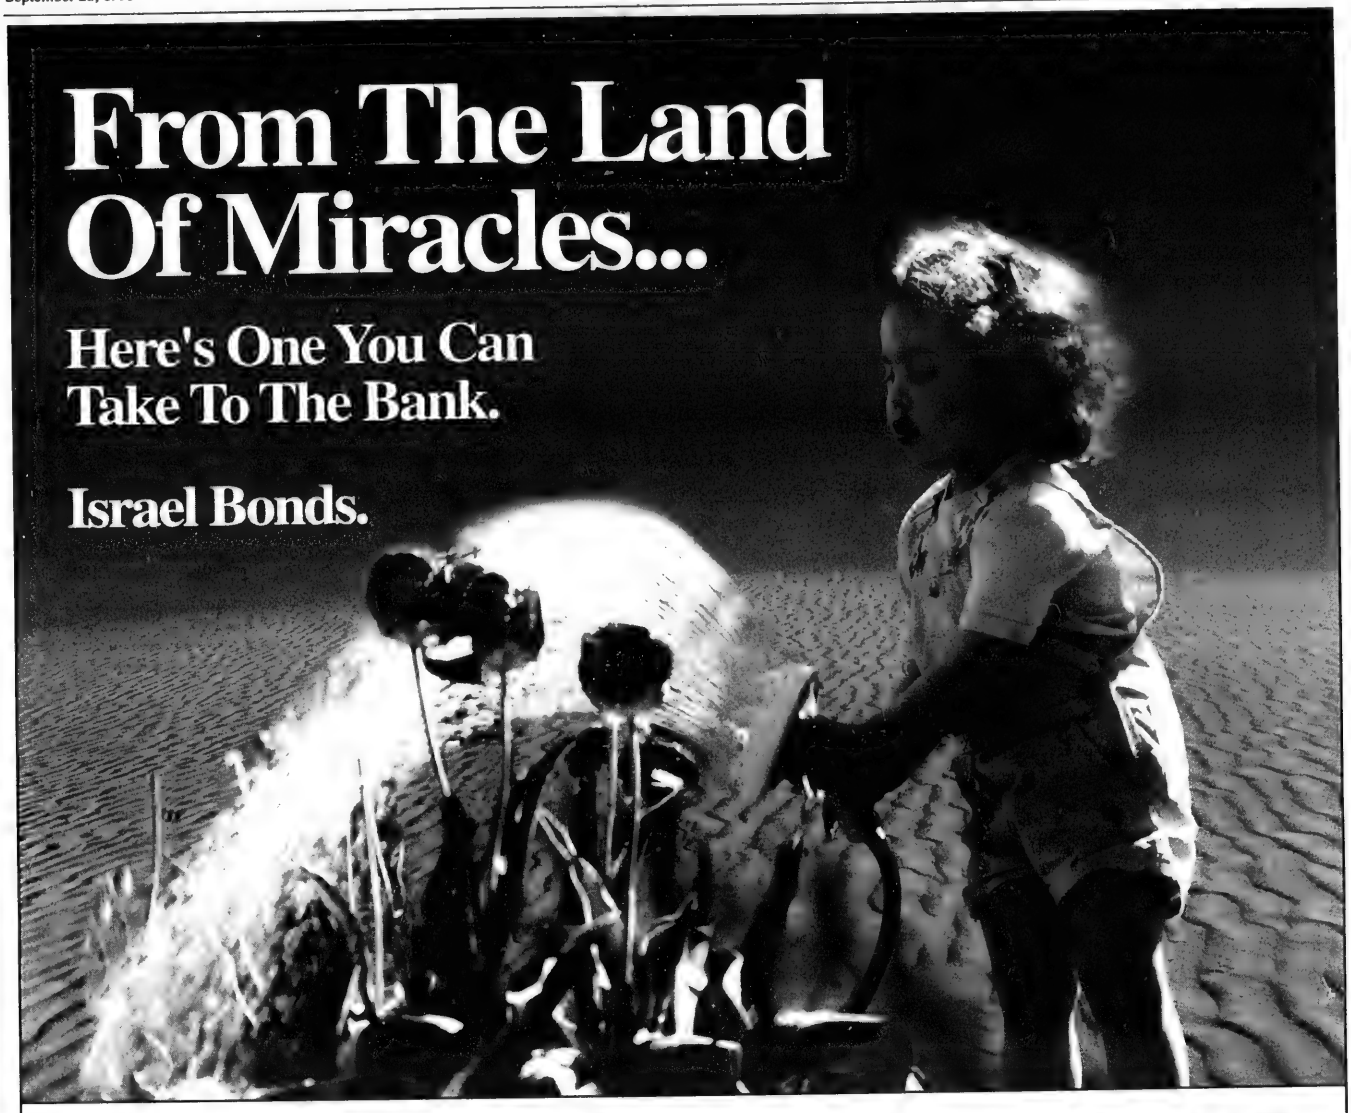
On Sept. 18, when frenzied money traders began buying up Canadian dollars after Chrétien's effective riposte to Preston Manning during Question Period in the Commons, the War Room was able to report back within seconds on the sudden rise in the dollar.

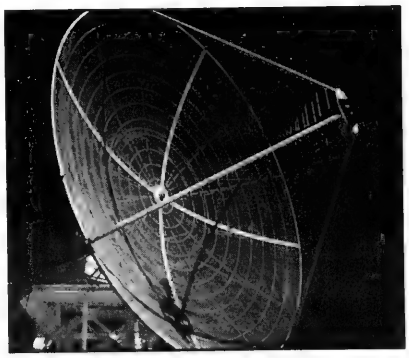
If the feds don't win this referendum, it won't be for lack of organization in the backrooms.

From The Land Of Miracles...

Here's One You Can Take To The Bank.

Israel Bonds.





Telecommunications Bezeq, the state owned telecommunications corporation will invest a total of $2.94 billion in the next four years.

Hydro Electric Power The Israel Electric Corporation will double its electric capacity in the next eight years at a cost of $1 billion a year.

Trans Israel Highway The first $800 million stage will boost regional development projects, including new cities along its route.

The miracles of the past, are nothing compared to the miracles taking place every day in Israel. In 1994, Israel's economy grew at a rate of 6.8% ...faster than all of the OECD (Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development) countries which averaged only 3.1%.

Israel's 1995 budget is $49 billion with a bold new $7.1 billion infrastructure program which includes a dramatic improvement in telecommunications, hydro electric power and road construction.

Aish HaTorah Centre opens

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN, Ont. — The Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre opened in Thornhill last week with hoopla, excitement, religious and municipal dignitaries and a palpable enthusiasm on the part of the organization's staff and volunteers.

But the happiness was tempered by the recent death of Judy Dan, wife of businessman and philanthropist Leslie Dan, who donated the building, which was dedicated to her memory.

The 22,000-square-foot, 3½-storey building on Clark Avenue just west of Bathurst Street was expected to be ready for the High Holy Days. Shabbat services have already been held there.

Master of ceremonies Harold Nashman said that Judy Dan's "artistic taste and love of the work of Aish HaTorah is part of the building and of our feelings."

The opening, he said, "is a joyous culmination of a great dream. It's the moment we've dreamed about and looked forward to for a year and a half."

Joe Berman, a longtime supporter and now chair of Aish HaTorah, praised the rabbis, board, workers, building supervisors and government officials who worked to bring the facility to near completion.

Berman praised the glass Aron Kodesh by artist Eric Wesselow, which he and his wife Helen dedicated, calling it "a work of divine guidance."

Aish HaTorah educational director Rabbi Ahron Hoch said the new facility will help deal with "the silent disappearance of the Jewish people" through assimilation.

He said that it will create a nurturing environment that will help to develop leaders and permit the development of "a community of people who are caring and non-judgemental, where everyone, at any level of observance, can feel welcome."

In an announcement that surprised even the honorees, Nashman said the penthouse window had been dedicated in honor of honorary fundraising co-chair Myrtle Coopersmith and her husband Henry, by their children.

Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson, congratulated Aish HaTorah "on this wonderful occasion. We are so pleased for you, and that there is another community centre in Vaughan to make us strong."

She presented a plaque on behalf of the members of the Vaughan council.

An emotional Leslie Dan called the opening one of "the moments in our lives when our achievements make us proud."

That the building was completed in only nine months, he said, "speaks of the high calibre of the rabbis and of the dedication of the community."

To a chorus of Siman tov u'mazel tov, Dan affixed the mezuzzah.

Among the dignataries present were Vaughan councillor Bernie Green and rabbis Akiva Stefansky, Baruch Taub and Henry Hoschander.

Celebrations continued all afternoon with a gala carnival.

Hundreds hindered by cuts to Wheel-Trans

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cutting off ambulatory people from Wheel-Trans as a result of heavily-reduced provincial government grants to the TTC has caused consternation and distress in the Jewish community.

"We are very concerned because 20 of our day programs are much dependent on Wheel-Trans," said Jennifer Schipper of Baycrest Geriatric Centre.

"It's having a disastrous impact on our programs," said Karen Nusbaum, director of Community and Family Services, Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). The stroke recovery and multiple sclerosis programs are heavily affected, she said.

The cut in Wheel-Trans service is bad news to hundreds of people who attend programs at the Betel Centre for Creative Living, said Sheila Zane, coordinator of social action.

The cuts, effective Sept. 24, rule out previously registered users who walk with the aid of walkers or canes, and in many cases are too disabled to use regular TTC services and cannot afford taxis. All ages are cut off, not just seniors, including those who use Wheel-Trans to get to work.

A pilot project, the new TTC Pulse bus service, started Sept. 5 in an area roughly bounded by Steeles on the north, Parkholme Boulevard on the south, Yonge Street on the east, and Bathurst on the west. But it will offer little relief to the problem, Zane said.

Replacing the former community bus service, Pulse is to serve only residents who start and end their trips in that geographic district, but supplies a Wheel-Trans type of service, assisting people on and off the bus.

Pulse was designed to offer a dial-a-bus service, 9:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., with only one hour's notice, to registered Wheel-Trans users, to give them a more spontaneous trip, whether to doctors, schools, work, programs, shopping or other needs, said Cathy Biggart of Wheel-Trans.

It will be re-evaluated in six months, perhaps even sooner, and applies only to that one area. Funding was provided through money made available by curtailing the community buses. For information on the exact routes Pulse buses will follow, call 416-393-4111.

The Pulse area does not extend as far south as Baycrest and the Wagman Centre but does include Betel, Branson Hospital, the Bathurst Jewish Centre, Centrepoint Mall and the North York Seniors Centre on Hendon Avenue.

Among those affected at BJC are people who come to evening programs at the centre, said Nusbaum.

Senior residents love Habayit Shelanu

TORONTO — The roof garden overlooking Casa Loma and the million-dollar town houses on Walmer Road is the social hot spot for 70 seniors now living in Habayit Shelanu (Our Home), a subsidized housing project at 155 Kendall Ave. opposite George Brown College.

"We're so happy here, it's unbelievable," said Helen Stutz, a tenant of the 59-unit, $6-million, five-storey building which recently had its official opening. In June, tenants started moving into Habayit Shelanu, which is now fully occupied.

"The roof is our favorite spot," said Stutz, who lived in a decrepit old house in the area before moving in. "One tenant even grew tomatoes on the roof and there's a pagoda for those who can't sit in the sun."

The project was sponsored by Senior Care and the housing agency of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

"Our goal is to have seniors age in place with the right kind of housing," said Habayit Shelanu president Dr. Les Richmond, as he cut the symbolic ribbon with fellow directors Maurice Rotfarb, Larry Schwartz, Angela Eliosoff, David Herlick and Elliott Peranson.

The mezuzah, in the shape of the apartment building, was affixed by Rabbi Ronald Weiss of Jewish Family and Child Service.

The market value rent of the units is $650 a month for a one-bedroom apartment and $775 for a two-bedroom, but 80 per cent of the building is subsidized, with tenants paying rent equal to 27 per cent of their income.

Ten couples are among the residents, who must be 59 or older, and four units are set aside for tenants with special needs.

The residents are proud of the security measures adopted to safeguard them in a busy urban area, Stutz said. Although there are 35 underground parking spaces, parking is still a problem in that congested district, she added.

In addition to a large multi-purpose common room on the main floor, the building has an attractive courtyard, hobby and craft rooms, an exercise room where tenants can take their own blood pressure, six coin-operated washing machines and dryers, and a social area on each floor for card playing or other activities.

Richmond gave special thanks to Senior Care executive director Michael Scheinert and to project coordinator Stephanie Olin Chapman.

For information, call Arnold Foss at 416-635-2860.

Vancouver federation urged to market education

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) should organize an aggressive marketing team to develop an innovative way to market Jewish education to "the widest possible audience," says a report called V'chai B'hem, issued in August by the Chai Group on Jewish identity and continuity.

V'chai B'hem (And you shall live by them) was commissioned by the JFGV and synagogues to analyze and report to the community on Jewish identity in the Lower Mainland (Greater Vancouver area).

Federation board members are currently studying the report and have been asked to report back by the end of 1995 on its proposals so there will be time to recommend appropriate allocations for the 1996-97 budget.

Chair of the Chai Group was Judge Bruce Cohen, with Arthur Fouks as honorary chair. The group comprised representatives of over 30 organizations and synagogues who consulted with close to 100 individuals to gather opinions on how to encourage children, young adults and even community leaders with limited knowledge of Judaism to take part in educational programs either on a direct or outreach basis.

The Chai Group, says the report, was formed to facilitate the creation of a community that is consciously Jewish and which has a sense of pride in its identity. Chai believes its recommendations can enhance the quality of Jewish life in the community.

The report points out that over 60 per cent of the federation funds allocated in 1994 for local programs and services was spent on "Jewish educational opportunities" for youth between ages 5 and 18. This age group comprises 23 per cent of the Jewish population, but only one-third of the possible students are currently enrolled in Jewish learning programs.

Chai recommends formation of a Council for Jewish Education to develop a corps of qualified teachers — some of whom would serve more than one school. Scholarships would be offered to students to take teacher training in return for two or more years of service to the community. An "Israel experience" is also advocated.

In outreach to adults the report proposes a goal of creating "a lifelong learning community that will provide enrichment through the ages and stages of Jewish life. This would enhance the Jewish skills of every adult in the community and maintain an educated leadership for our communal institutions."

To encourage young adults, whether married or single, Chai says the community must develop programs "to attract and hold our population. We need to be proactive, not passive in waiting for the young adults to turn up on our doorstep."

The report suggests a series of chavurot for young adults in a variety of locations; a matchmaking service; help with job searches; and marketing these programs by a central marketing committee.

The report calls for close cooperation with all synagogues and rabbis and urges minimal synagogue fees for young couples and newcomers. It suggests also that resources be directed to allow congregations to provide "a full potential professional staff component."

Yad Sarah saves Israeli economy over $220 million

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — By providing rehabilitation services for the infirm, the disabled and the elderly in their own environment, and thus reducing or eliminating hospital stays, Yad Sarah saves the Israeli economy more than $220 million annually, according to a recent newsletter.

Yad Sarah, Israel's largest volunteer organization, provides medical equipment, guidance and rehabilitative therapy to some 200,000 people each year, free of charge or for a nominal fee.

Yad Sarah's warehouses have an inventory of more than 250,000 items, comprising nearly 300 different kinds of equipment.

Its 4,000 volunteers operate 70 branches throughout Israel.

At Yad Sarah's workshops, volunteers — new immigrants and veteran Israelis — work together repairing wheelchairs and other medical and rehabilitative equipment.

Eighteen years ago, Rabbi Uri Lupoliansky lent a vaporizer to a neighbor whose child had trouble breathing. After neighbors heard of the loan, they too asked to borrow the device, which was hard to come by and expensive.

Rabbi Lupoliansky quickly realized that there was a great need for free loans of medical equipment.

When his father Ya'acov offered him a considerable amount of money for charity in memory of his mother who died in the Holocaust, the rabbi decided to set up a free loan fund of medical devices such as vaporizers, wheelchairs, oxygen tanks and walkers.

Over the years, Yad Sarah expanded to include laundry service for the bed-ridden and incontinent, vans to transport the disabled, emergency beepers, meals on wheels, home visits, a dental clinic and coffee house for the elderly, a grandparent sitting service, a day-care centre for people with severe disabilities and home repair service for those unable to fend for themselves.

At Yad Sarah's Skill Training Centre and Workshops, students and new arrivals are taught a new trade, receive lessons in Hebrew and Judaism and learn about their new country.

The courses are six months long and graduates receive a certificate recognized by the Ministry of Labor.

Yad Sarah hopes to establish its national headquarters in a building near Mt. Herzl. No government funds have been promised, but the land was donated by the Israel Lands Administration.

New Winnipeg rabbi rests on his record

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Allan Meyerowitz, the new spiritual leader of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, fondly remembers the time he spent in the late 1980s as co-chair of the Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry, and as Soviet Jewry chair for the American Rabbinical Assembly, despite an impressive arrest record.

"It was very exciting," says Rabbi Meyerowitz who hails from New Jersey. "The movement brought together rabbis who wanted to do something about Soviet Jewry. We wanted to make a difference. We organized demonstrations involving rabbis from all denominations."

Rabbi Meyerowitz built up a record of another kind as well — eight arrests for civil disobedience.

Rabbi Allan Meyerowitz

Although all the charges were eventually dropped, he recalls the one day he spent in prison as very difficult.

His motivation, he recalls, was concern that one day his children might ask him what he did to try to save Russian Jewry from extinction. "I heard echoes of the 1940s," he says.

Although Jews are now free to leave the countries of the former Soviet Union, according to Rabbi Meyerowitz, the work of rescue is just beginning.

"After living in such a strongly atheistic and anti-Jewish society, it is going to take many years of hard work to help Russian Jewry feel that they and their children are part of the world Jewish community," he says.

Rabbi Meyerowitz also observes that North American rabbis have their work cut out in trying to make the religious experience meaningful for the majority of North American Jewry.

The rabbi has written a book, The Kiss of God. The title, he explains, comes from a midrash that, on Mount Sinai, G-d transmitted the Torah through a kiss, a spontaneous outburst of love, rather than on a scroll.

Strong and growing congregation

As for his new congregation (he previously served pulpits in Michigan and New Jersey), Winnipeg's oldest and, with close to 1,100 member families, largest synagogue, he sees tremendous potential.

"The Shaarey Zedek is a strong and growing congregation that pursue excellence and works to meet the needs of its members," he says. "My own goal is to make this a synagogue where people feel at home, a place where we can try creative experiments to make the religious experience more meaningful.

Rabbi Meyerowitz replaces Rabbi Henry Balser, who left the congregation at the end of June after six years at the Shaarey Zedek.

Rabbi Balser, in cooperation with Perle Selch, the Shaarey Zedek's retiring executive director, introduced many innovations and programs, on which Rabbi Meyerowitz says he hopes to build.

Fly-in participants moved by Holocaust Museum

CJN staff reporter Frances Kraft accompanied the United Jewish Appeal's third annual Washington Fly-In, at the invitation of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. Following is the second of two articles on the mission. The first article appeared last week.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — An El Al-style minyan — topped off by the sounding of a shofar — was just ending as we began our descent into Washington for this year's United Jewish Appeal (UJA) one-day mission from Toronto.

Although the visit was primarily an educational one, it had a strong fundraising component. In total, fly-in participants pledged $739,000 for the next three years.

UJA funds an extensive network of educational and social services in Toronto and Israel, as well as helping with the rescue of Jews in danger around the world.

The fly-in, at a cost of $450 per person, is open to individuals who have made a minimum UJA donation of $1,000 ($2,000 per household). Although the program was started earlier, it has been an annual event only since 1993.

But the Toronto fly-in is just one cog in the wheel of a much larger program co-sponsored by UJA and the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF), a Washington-based umbrella group.

The larger program, instituted in 1977, hosts groups from across North America for a series of tightly scheduled political briefings and related activities packed into one day. Montreal and Vancouver have also participated.

The day in Washington began at the U.S. State Department, where a senior representative discussed the Middle East peace process in the auditorium formerly used by President John F. Kennedy for press conferences. Further briefings were held in a Capitol Hill building.

The Council of Jewish Federations guide accompanying each bus provided information on the speakers and sights, among them the privately funded U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum built on government land.

Most of the 130 fly-in participants were first-time visitors to the 2½-year-old museum, and the touring time allotted left too many strong impressions taken in too quickly — the stories-high Tower of Faces, a collection of pre-war photos from a community that no longer exists; the hospital paraphernalia in a display on Nazi killing of the handicapped; before-and-after images of a once-magnificent synagogue; communion pictures of Jewish children hidden by Catholic families; the view from inside a cattle car used to transport Jews to concentration camps; and finally, the taped testimony of survivors. Many visitors just shook their heads in silence.

Daniel's Story, a detailed walk-through exhibit that is not part of the permanent collection, is designed to appeal to children, with boxes and windows to open and sturdy copies of Daniel's "diary" to leaf through.

The hands-on exhibit, based on a story by Winnipeg author Carol Matas, begins in the happy pre-war home of a young Jewish boy and his family, where the cookie tin is full and laughter can be heard in the kitchen. Their subsequent ghetto hovel and the concentration camp to which they are sent form the other major components of the exhibit.

Daniel's Story will be available for travel, said Michael Berenbaum, director of research at the museum. It is on exhibit in Washington until 1998.

The day's theme — Past, Present and Future — was summed up in a concluding address by Mark Talisman, founder of the CJF Washington Action Office.

Chuck Gold and Carol Kassel, 1996 campaign co-chairs, urged participants to make three-year commitments to UJA. The long-range plan, introduced this year, is unique in North America, said Talisman.

Liz Wolfe, one of three fly-in co-chairs along with Stephen Diamond and Michael Halbert, called on the thirty- and fortysomething participants to take community responsibility. "We aren't the future. We are the present," she said.

Bonds: key source of capital

By MAJ.-GEN. NATHAN SHARONY (Ret.)
Special to The CJN

Nathan Sharony

TORONTO — Since its inception in 1951, the Israel Bonds organization has provided Israel's Finance Ministry with more than $14 billion (US) in capital, through the sale of bonds and other debt securities.

That capital has helped build the infrastructure — including roads, harbors, airports, telecommunications and power stations — that has enhanced every aspect of Israel's economy.

Recently, Israel has been issued an investment-grade rating of BBB+, prompting some donors to question the necessity for Israel Bonds. There are many important reasons, however, why Israel Bonds continues to be a viable and effective endeavor.

Since 1990, Israel has almost quadrupled its investment in infrastructure and, like any growing enterprise, the country needs working capital. Israel Bonds is one of the three principal sources of these funds in Israel — together with international bank loans and U.S. loan guarantees. A fourth means to secure economic resources, issuing securities with their own guarantee in the North American bond markets, is now being planned.

Unlike some other sources, Israel Bonds has a proven record of reliability — not a point to be taken lightly. For many years, when foreign aid levels were low and numerous financial institutions closed their doors to Israel, Israel Bonds provided the capital that facilitated the development of a modern industrial economy. The acrimonious battle over the issuance of U.S.-backed loan guarantees underscored the need for a dependable source of economic support.

Since 1991, Israel Bonds has realized sales of approximately $1 billion (US) annually. A tremendous achievement in itself, this becomes more significant in view of the competitive cost of raising capital through Israel Bonds.

At a time when concerns are raised about the strength of the Israel-Diaspora relationship, the Bonds organization offers a direct connection with Israel, making the purchaser a firsthand participant in the building of the Jewish state.

I recently visited Israel, where an international Bonds delegation dedicated a new science-based industrial park in the Galilee. The park epitomized exactly the type of project for which Bonds capital has been deemed so necessary throughout the years. Only Israel Bonds offers this direct opportunity to build and develop the modern Jewish nation. Accordingly, Israel Bonds has placed the highest priority on reaching out to ever-greater numbers of Jews, particularly among the young generation.

Furthermore, the international Jewish community provides a vital safety net for Israel's recovery. When Middle East news is bleak and financial institutions view Israel with trepidation, the Jewish community typically responds with a surge in Israel Bonds sales.

For all these reasons, Israel Bonds continues to be an important, efficient enterprise, with a central role to play in the ongoing development of Israel's economy.

The writer is president and chief executive officer of State of Israel Bonds.

Jewish Agency is being restructured

The mass immigration of Soviet Jews, for example, was financed in this way.

Weisband said the Agency has been experiencing a "radical drop" in income in recent years. Coupled with higher than expected expenses over the last five years (due to larger than expected aliyah), the Agency has been running a deficit of $23 to $54 million (US) per year. The deficit for 1995 is projected at $80 million.

By 1998, the cumulative deficits will be greater than annual income.

"We have done a projection of current activity, in 1995 dollars, through the year 2000. If we continue the current expenditures and income, we'll have a $670-million cumulative deficit at the end of 2000."

Weisband said contributions from U.S. sources in particular have dropped significantly in recent years as communities allocate greater amounts to local needs.

Comments made last year by Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, that Israel no longer needs the Diaspora's assistance, do not make it easier to convince U.S. contributors to donate their money, Weisband said.

Israel's economy may be booming, but the number of people living below the poverty line has increased from 10 to 12 per cent in about three years, he continued. Many of them are recent olim.

U.S. contributors are becoming more hesitant to give to the Jewish Agency because too large a proportion of the funds don't make it to intended benficiaries, Weisband said.

Between 40 and 42 per cent of funds raised in the United States are earmarked for foreign recipients, but when administrative costs and other beneficiaries (like the Joint Distribution Committee) are factored in, only 30 per cent ends up in Israel, he said.

Contributions from Canada, although down slightly, are closer to the historical 50 per cent. (Toronto is expected to cut its 1996 Israel allocation by 1.4 per cent — $166,000.)

The Jewish Agency has responded to the falling dollars by improving its efficiency and cutting costs. Staff has been slashed from 3,600 to 1,400 in eight years, and a further 300 to 400 will probably be let go.

"The cost effectiveness of the Agency is not only vastly improved, but is really quite good," Weisband said.

As part of the Agency's restructuring proposals, it is asking the government of Israel to assume some of the responsibilities long associated with the Agency, especially initial absorption, and for residential education programs, known as Youth Aliyah villages.

That will leave the Agency with responsibility for aliyah, Jewish education for the young and some Israeli social services. Project Renewal, which twins Diaspora communities with towns in Israel, would be retained, he said.

In addition to trimming the fat from the Agency's bloated bureaucracy, it is considering new sources of revenue, Weisband said. There are three sectors in the United States that have been virturally untapped — the financial community, the entertainment industry and hi-tech industries.

Weisband said the Jewish Agency will continue to make its argument that "we have a mutual responsibility. I don't want to take the phrase 'charity begins at home' so literally that we divide Israel and the Diaspora. 'Home' means the Jewish people as a whole."

Marx calls for CJC review

"The plenary created a lot of tension, frustration, anger and some bitterness," said Marx.

He reiterated that this was the first time in Congress history that an election degenerated in this way and that it seems clear the bylaws were not sufficient to prevent what occurred.

"We will review carefully what happened, and make sure it does not happen again ... We will suggest ways to fix what is broken," he said.

The officers later decided that written submissions by "interested parties" will be accepted, probably in January and February, Cohen said. It is not clear whether the officers agree with Marx that the entire process should be open to the Jewish media.

Final approval of the commission's recommendations rests with the national council of Congress, a body composed of everyone who was a delegate at the last plenary, Cohen said. It will likely convene in the fall of 1996.

Cohen said the officers do not want an "inquiry" into the election as such, in the sense of finding fault with anyone's actions or calling into question the validity of the process.

A study paper distributed to the national executive recommends that delegates representing organizations should register by the same 30-day deadline as delegates at large from the regions. As it stands, organizational delegates may register up to and including the first day of a plenary.

Hijacking brings case of missing flyer to the fore

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The fate of missing airman Ron Arad came to the fore for Israelis again after a hijacked Iranian jet was forced to land on Israeli soil last week.

Arad's mother, Batya, and his two brothers, Chen and David, flew to the Ovda military air base in the southern Negev last Wednesday to ask the passengers of the hijacked airplane to issue a plea to the Iranian government for Arad's safe return.

"When you return, each of you appeal to your government, to [President Hashemi] Rafsanjani to help us get information about him and his release," Batya Arad told the passengers.

One of several Israel MiAs being sought by government officials and by distraught family members, Arad bailed out from a fighter plane over Lebanon in 1986 and was believed to have been held by pro-Iranian troops in Lebanon.

The last time any message was received that he was alive was in October 1987. Since then, there have been sporadic reports that he was subsequently transferred to captivity in Iran.

At the air force base, the family distributed leaflets about Arad, as well as "Free Ron Arad" stickers.

Education Minister Amnon Rubinstein said Israeli officials had questioned some of the passengers about Arad.

But most of them said they never heard of Arad.

"I feel sad for the family, but I believe whatever my government says about this story," Mehdi Darayli, an English teacher from Tehran, told Israel Radio.

Others said they felt that they were being subjected to a propaganda effort.

"We are civilians, not government officials," one of the passengers, an engineer from Tehran, told Israel Television. "This is all public relations for the Israeli government."

The saga of the hijacked plane began last Tuesday morning, when a pistol-brandishing flight attendant in his 30s commandeered the Boeing 707 during a domestic flight from Tehran to the Persian Gulf resort island of Kish.

He demanded to fly to Europe. But the plane, which was short of fuel, landed in Israel after both Jordan and Saudi Arabia refused its request to land.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin forbade the plane to land at Ben-Gurion, fearing that it was filled with explosives and on a terror mission.

Instead, he instructed the Israeli air force to escort it to Ovda, a large military air base in the southern Negev that is also used as a civilian terminal, mainly for charter flights to Eilat.

An Israeli Hercules transport plane, carrying an army anti-terror team, touched down at Ovda immediately after the Iranian plane landed, with the crack unit ready to attack, if necessary.

But further radio contact with the cockpit soon established that beyond the hijacking itself, there was nothing sinister about the flight.

According to Israel Defence Force Chief of Staff, Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, the hijacker was "fed up with living in Iran."

The hijacker surrendered to Israeli security officials after the plane landed.

The passengers, mostly tourists, spent the night at the Ovda base, where the men were questioned by security officials.

On Wednesday, Israel released the plane and its 174 passengers and crew, some 35 hours after it first touched down.

Two Israeli F-16 jet fighters accompanied the plane until it left Israeli air space. The flight was then routed over Turkey for the three-hour trip back to Iran.

The hijacker, who was reportedly seeking political asylum in the United States, was detained for further questioning.

Earlier Wednesday, Rabin approved the plane's release after holding top-level consultations.

The ministerial committee on national security issued a statement officially announcing that the Israeli government was letting the flight return to Iran, with which Israel maintains no diplomatic relations.

Arad's family called on Israel to hold the plane as a bargaining chip for Arad's release, but the government rejected the idea.

"I believe that we made the right decision not to support any piracy in the air," Rabin said.

The cabinet issued a communique stating that "Israel stands by its strong opposition to air piracy and is releasing the plane and passengers despite the hostility of the Iranian regime towards Israel."

Iran had demanded the immediate return of all passengers, including the hijacker.

Iranian Television condemned Israel for holding the passengers and crew, and demanded their immediate release from "occupied Palestine."

Shortly before the plane took off from Israel, Iran's United Nations envoy Kamal Kharrazi accused Israel of hostage-taking and called the hijacking a "preplanned Zionist operation."

Israel rejected Iran's demand that the hijacker be extradited. Instead, police said, he was taken to Eilat for further questioning.

Israel Radio reported that the hijacker would be handed over to authorities from the international committee of the Red Cross.

Five other passengers reportedly asked for asylum in Israel, but they were travelling with the rest of the passengers when the flight returned to Tehran.

Arad's mother feels 'betrayed'

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Batya Arad, the mother of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad, said last week she feels "betrayed" by the government's decision to release the hijacked Iranian jet and its passengers.

"The Arad family believes that after nine years in which Ron's whereabouts remain unknown yet are linked to Iran, it is implausible that Israel would not take advantage of a situation involving Iranian nationals to advance Ron's cause," she said in a radio interview.

"[Prime Minister Yitzhak] Rabin talks about a humanitarian gesture. I'd like to see these gestures work both sides. Today I feel betrayed by my government," Batya Arad said.

Prior to the jet's release, Ron Arad's brother Chen told Army Radio that Israel "should use use this opportunity to create some kind of connection with the Iranian government."

Tsomet MK Pini Badash sent a telegram to Rabin demanding that the more than 170 Iranians be exchanged for Ron Arad.

"This is an opportunity we have to take advantage of," Badash told Associated Press. "It's our chance to get Arad back."

Relations not affected by arms sales

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Russian sales of arms and nuclear reactors to Iran do not appear to be affecting Israel's growing bilateral relations with Russia.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

Israel has repeatedly expressed anxiety about these deals, particularly Russia's plan to build two nuclear reactors in southern Iran.

Two weeks ago, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, in his second visit to Russia in as many years, raised the issue in talks with Foreign Minister Andrei Kozyrev and Prime Minister Viktor Chernomydrin.

Rabin left Moscow empty-handed, having been informed that the sale of nuclear technology to Iran was for peaceful purposes and would not impinge on Israel's security.

Israel, however, is not sanguine about Iran's intentions, being convinced that Iran — one of its foremost enemies in the region — intends to become a nuclear power.

The United States concurs with this assessment. "Today Iran is engaged in a crash effort to develop nuclear weapons," Secretary of State Warren Christopher said recently.

With this in mind, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told the United Nations last May that the potential threat from Iran is one of the main reasons why Israel refuses to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, to which Iran is a signatory.

These admonitions have fallen on deaf ears in Moscow because Russia is desperate for hard currency to prop up its sagging economy and eager to recover the influence it lost in the Middle East when the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991.

The successor state of the Soviet Union, Russia stands to earn upwards of $1 billion (US) for the reactors, which will be under the scrutiny of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency. Russia has already sold Iran three Kilo-class submarines and combat aircraft worth billions. The Russians claim that they are not offensive weapons and will in fact contribute to the balance of power between Iran and Iraq.

(In addition, Russia has resumed selling weaponry and spare parts to Syria, Israel's most potent adversary. The Russians insist that this equipment will not erode Israel's qualitative military edge over Syria.)

Despite Israel's unhappiness with the transfer of Russian weapons to its foes, the basic relationship between the two countries remains intact.

Israel and Russia have greatly expanded ties since the demise of the Soviet Union. In September 1992, they signed a wide-ranging memorandum calling for cooperation in political, economic, cultural, scientific and technological spheres.

As well, Israel and Russia have exchanged military attaches.

In short, normal relations have been established, a sharp departure from the bad old days when Israel and the Soviet Union were barely on speaking terms.

The Soviet Union — one of the first countries to extend recognition to the Jewish state in 1948 — severed official relations with Israel during the Six Day War, a reflection of its pro-Arab policy. For approximately the next two decades, there was much acrimony and a minimum of contact.

But in the late 1980s, with Mikhail Gorbachev at the helm, there was a gradual improvement as the Soviet Union and Israel forged a rapprochement. By 1991, when the emigration of Soviet Jews to Israel was in full swing and the Madrid peace process was on the verge of unfolding, the two sides had fully normalized relations.

Since then, Israel and Russia have formed something of a friendship based on mutual interests. Moscow recognizes Israel's strategic importance and its weight as a player in the Middle East. Israel is cognizant of Russia's clout there and of its historic ties to the Arab/Muslim world.

But, as the sale of Russian nuclear reactors and weaponry to Iran indicates, every geo-political relationship has its inherent limits.

PRINCIPAL/TEACHER REQUIRED

A person with excellent administrative and interpersonal skills is needed by a vigorous Jewish Day School in a smaller Southern Ontario community. The school stresses traditional Judaism and Hebrew without compromise of secular subjects. The person we require will have the ability to act as principal (half time) and teach traditional Judaism and Jewish History (half time). The start date is negotiable.

Storm hits community

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ST. THOMAS — The 800 members of the St. Thomas Jewish community have a long haul ahead of them.

In addition to reorganizing their thwarted bicentennial celebration, which took five years to plan, they will be mending their temple and their homes in the wake of last weekend's Hurricane Marilyn.

The storm, which battered St. Thomas, in the U.S. Virgin Islands, not only razed a social hall on the grounds of the 200-year-old United Hebrew Congregation, but left half the Jewish population homeless.

The hurricane killed eight people, wounded about 185 and destroyed or damaged 80 per cent of the houses on the island.

Among the displaced is the Reform temple's rabbi, Bradd Boxman, whose home was "virtually demolished," the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) said in a statement.

"We're lucky to be alive," said Linda Boxman, the rabbi's wife, in a telephone interview from Florida, where they had been airlifted.

The rabbi was scheduled to head back to St. Thomas last week.

"The entire Jewish community of the Caribbean, and especially the members of the Hebrew Congregation of St. Thomas, join me in asking you for your prayers and inviting you to visit us during the resumption of our bicentennial celebration."

The United Hebrew Congregation building is believed to be the oldest in continuous use under the U.S. flag.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 18

• Davar reported that two new Arab-Israeli parties, including one representing the Islamic movement, began organizing to compete in Knesset elections scheduled for Nov. 1996. One party will be headed by Ahmad Tibi; the other by Sheikh Ataf Khatib.

Sept. 19

• A delegation of Shas Knesset members met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to discuss the government's policies concerning religious affairs. Shas leader MK Shlomo Benizri said, "There were no promises, but we left with a very good feeling. We felt that there is a desire to listen and we are hoping to establish a channel of rapprochement with Rabin."

• After returning from meetings with leading business figures in the United States, U.S. ambassador to Israel Martin Indyk expressed optimism about the possibilities for Israel's economic growth, its trade with its neighbors and economic relations with the United States.

Sept. 20

• The IDF closed the borders of the Gaza Strip. The closure will last at least until the end of the Rosh Hashanah. It was imposed after defence authorities received intelligence warnings about planned terrorist acts inside Israel.

Sept. 21

• On the eve of the New Year, Israel's official population is reported to be 5,570,000. Eighty-one per cent of the population is Jewish, 14.5 per cent are Muslim, 2.9 per cent Christian, and 1.7 per cent are Druze.

• Immigration figures for the last Jewish calendar year rose nine per cent. Israel absorbed 82,000 new arrivals, with 3,500 arriving from Western Europe, 3,150 from North America, 1,300 from Ethiopia and 137 from Australia. Approximately one out of every eight immigrants works in either scientific or academic fields. Of the immigrants, 1,140 work as either writers, journalists or artists.

Sept. 22

• Syria's foreign minister denied earlier reports that U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher would soon be coming to the region to resume negotiations.

•Fourteen people were killed this week in a number of auto accidents. Thirty-nine were injured. Since the beginning of the year, 520 people have died on the roads.

Tribute set for slain athletes

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — Israeli and German Jewish officials have dropped their plans to boycott this week's dedication ceremony of a monument to the 11 Israeli athletes killed in a terrorist attack during the 1972 Munich Olympic games.

The officials lifted their boycott of the Sept. 27 ceremony after the German Olympic Committee assured them that the plaque on the monument would explicitly state the Israelis were victims of a terrorist attack.

The plaque's original text said the athletes were the victims of "violence," without specific mention of the attack by Palestinian terrorists.

The omission enraged Israeli and German Jewish officials.

Among those who stated their intention to boycott the ceremony were Israeli ambassador Avi Primor; Ignatz Bubis, head of Germany's Jewish community; and Yoram Oberkovitz, a member of the Israeli Olympic Committee.

The German Olympic Committee changed the plaque's text after intensive negotiations with the Jewish officials.

Committee members said they would not be able to change the text in time for the ceremony, but they pledged to do so as soon as possible.

Palestinian terrorists belonging to the Black September movement infiltrated the Olympic village on Sept. 5, 1972, the 11th day of the Munich Olympics.

The terrorists killed two Israeli athletes and took nine others hostage, demanding the release of 200 Arab prisoners in Israel.

In a shootout at the airport later that day when German police attempted to free the hostages, all nine hostages were killed, as were a German policeman and five of the terrorists. Three of the Palestinians were arrested.

Relatives of the Israeli victims blamed the German police for botching the airport rescue attempt, and sued local authorities for compensation.

That trial is still pending.

Germany seeks war criminal

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — German prosecutors have posted a reward equalling $333,000 (US) for information leading to the arrest of the last leading Nazi still believed to be on the loose.

Alois Brunner, 83, has been the target for years of fruitless search efforts. State prosecutors in Cologne and Frankfurt made the reward offer in the hope of finally capturing him.

Brunner, an Austrian citizen, served during World War II as personal secretary to Adolf Eichmann, Hitler's chief aide.

The person Eichmann once described as his "best man" orchestrated the deaths of some 128,000 Jews from Austria, Greece, France and Slovakia during the war years. Brunner was listed earlier this year in the German newsmagazine Focus as one of Interpol's 12 most-wanted people.

According to the magazine, the former SS officer, who was previously believed to be living undisturbed in Damascus, Syria, had obtained an Austrian passport under an assumed name and moved to Argentina.

But in August, French police said they failed to locate Brunner in Argentina after receiving tips that he had left his hideout in Syria.

Brunner lived in Essen, Germany, until 1954 under the alias Alois Schmaldienst.

He then fled to Damascus, where he worked as a businessman and "government adviser" using the name Georg Fischer.

Authorities in Germany, France and Austria have issued warrants for Brunner's arrest.

As far back as 1992, diplomats in Syria maintained that Brunner was dead.

But the German newsmagazine Der Spiegel quoted French Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld as saying that Brunner still lives in Damascus in a state-owned apartment, under a "sort of a house arrest."

According to various reports, Brunner has been spotted in Brazil, Argentina, Chile and Cambodia.

Metulla's Canada Centre a magnet for visitors

By NECHEMIA MEYERS
Special to The CJN

METULLA, Israel — When my grandsons and I were recently enjoying the Jacuzzi at Metulla's Canada Centre, we soon became aware that we were the only ones in the tub speaking Hebrew; all the rest were conversing in Arabic.

This, admittedly, is not the usual picture at the Canada Centre — which boasts indoor and outdoor swimming pools, an ice skating rink, a basketball court, a firing range, two squash courts, an aerobics room and a soccer field — but it is not so unusual either.

Among the half-million people who use the centre's facilities each year, there are a large number of Arabs from various parts of the Galilee and from the nearby security zone of south Lebanon. Just how many nobody knows because, as the centre's deputy director, Yitzhak Sandler, puts it, "We don't differentiate in any way between Arabs and Jews."

Residents of the security zone — Christians, Muslims and Druze — are particularly grateful to have access to the centre, where they can enjoy a brief respite from constant tension and where their children can participate in bilingual day camps.

The Canada Centre has not only made life more pleasant for the population of the area, it has also given it an economic boost. Israelis from Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem are now more likely to vacation in the Galilee because besides visiting its many scenic spots and boating or floating down the Jordan, they can also relax at the centre. Moreover, while they can go swimming or play basketball in a lot of other places, only in Metulla can they go ice skating at a decent rink.

Snow piled on roof

Though the border town has not been hit by terrorist rockets for several years, every time the Galilee is shelled, there is a drop in attendance at the Canada Centre, albeit usually for only a few days.

The only substantial damage the centre itself has ever suffered was from snow, not shells. So much snow piled up on the roof of the skating rink during a recent winter that the roof caved in and had to be replaced.

The existing rink will soon be dwarfed by a new one being constructed at a cost of some $4 million. It will be of Olympic size — the first of its kind in the Middle East — and will include seating for 1,000 people (plus the possibility of adding 1,000 more temporary seats).

The new facility is being created with an eye to a future, more peaceful Middle East, when, hopefully, skaters from the surrounding countries will come to participate in regional competitions.

While Sandler agrees that it won't happen soon, he points out that kids in Metulla and the surrounding area are already being taught the rudiments of ice skating and ice hockey by Russian immigrants and a group of volunteers from Toronto.

So when the Egyptian, Syrian and Iraqi skaters finally arrive at the Canada Centre rink, the Israelis will be ready for them.

Economic ties slow to come

By EMILY HAUSER
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — Middle East peace negotiators often present the potential for a booming regional economy as one of the most important by-products of the peace process — as well as a crucial factor in the talks' successful conclusion. Peace will raise standards of living in the area, goes the argument, and if standards of living are not raised, peace won't last.

Sept. 13 was the second anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Principles (DoP) between Israel and the Palestinians. The DoP was seen by many as the beginning of a new age in the Middle East, a time in which the peoples of the region could stop fighting and start doing business, opening the door for great economic growth for everyone concerned.

Yet many experts say that the outlook for bilateral trade within the area is not promising and focus should instead be placed on regional cooperation and foreign investment. As former enemies gear up for the Amman Business Conference planned for October, one question is still unanswered: How viable is an integrated Middle Eastern economy?

To Alon Liel, director general of Israel's Economic Planning Ministry, the question of trade is clear. There is little or no potential.

"Our economic structures are very different," he explains. "While most Arab countries are still characterized by a heavy agricultural sector, the Israeli economy is much more oriented to industry — mainly hi-tech — and has a sophisticated service sector."

Furthermore, many specialists point to the discrepancy between the countries' per capita gross domestic products (GDP): Israel's stands at $15,000 annually, compared to the $800 to $1,200 per capita GDP of the neighboring countries. The combined 1994 GDP of Jordan, Syria, Egypt and Lebanon, for instance, barely outstripped Israel's $73.9 billion.

Moreover, even intra-Arab trade is very low, rarely amounting to more than 10 per cent of each country's export, says Shaul Sasson, assistant director of the Middle East Department of Israel's Industry and Trade Ministry.

Dan Catarivas, director of the same ministerial department, concurs. "Historically, there has never been a situation like this, where a developed country has had to face, at such proximity, a completely different world."

Where the potential lies, these men say, is in joint development. The recent decision of an Israeli supermarket chain to import Jordanian food is colorful, but it doesn't amount to much cash, they say.

The experts believe the future is in projects such as the airport planned for the southern Jordan-Israel border, on which feasiblity studies are being carried out by an American firm, or the recently announced plans to build five "peace" highways, connecting Israel, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority and Egypt, on which the European Community will be doing the feasibility studies.

Liel reports that meetings are held daily between Israel and Arab government figures, businesspeople and planners, all leading up to October's conference. One of the conference's goals, he says, is the declaration of a Regional Business Council, "which would act as a joint lobby for the states of the area."

The Amman conference is the long-anticipated follow-up to last year's Casablanca conference, at which Israelis and Arabs were able to publicly do business for the first time. More a symbolic opening of doors than a place for concrete action, Casablanca was characterized by a great deal of drama.

Abdulanabi al-Sho'ala, chair of Gulf Markets International, a Baharaini trading company, was struck by the unprecedented camaraderie he witnessed at the conference.

"Nobody would believe these people have had a problem for half a century," he told reporters at the time. "I think the ground is now open. The opportunities are there, the environment is right and the time is right for getting to know one another."

Casablanca participants have been working on specific deals ever since, waiting, in many cases, for a chance to air them in Amman. In October, the Jordanians will host 700 international businessmen and women and 400 government officials.

International firms have already begun to move into the arena. Ace Hardware Corp. intends to use its recently established Israeli branch as a training and merchandise base for stores throughout the region. Nestle invested $44 million, in taking an option to buy 10 per cent of Osem, Israel's second largest food company; while Osem, in turn, is planning a joint-venture food processing plant in Egypt.

Likewise, Timex Corp. is opening a research and development office in Jerusalem this month and has plans for a sales and marketing office in Dubai. Muhammad Saleh, Timex vice-president of human resources, recently told the Wall Street Journal: "We always take an interest in a whole region, as opposed to doing business in a small pocket here or there. In the past, the Middle East has been a difficult area to do business in ... We think of the region now globally."

Liel is somewhat concerned that Islamic terrorism or the current impasse in the talks with Syria and Lebanon could undermine the progress made so far, but he takes a cautiously optimistic tone.

"We are sowing the first seeds of some sort of integration. We are creating a life together. Often, this will in turn create political facts," Liel says.

Catarivas cautions against expecting economic miracles. "It's not going to happen rapidly ... We're not even coming at this from the same place as post-war Europe, which had a pre-existing industrial base. We have to build a regional industrial infrastructure entirely from scratch."

If only you could pronounce those names!

Relax. Even though these French-named stores really do have a French owner – Jean Dumas, originally from Quebec City), he and partner/wife Cerissa Abbott are far too busy finding the right fit for your children to worry about a few missed inflections ici et là. In their ten years of operation, they've built a reputation for quality, reliability and service at Bon Lieu (clothing, 890 Yonge St. at Davenport) and Petit Pied (shoes, 890 Yonge Street and 2651 Yonge Street next to Sporting Life).

North store now open

Though the thoroughly bilingual and staunchly pro-Canadian couple will deny there's a Gallic influence at work, you can see it in the colourful, avant-garde fashions and footwear they offer their clients, and you can feel it in the warm, gracious service they provide. Their expertise and cheery demeanour extend to the staff, who are carefully trained and supervised before they have the opportunity to serve you. The stores' standards are uncompromising: "We will refuse to sell a garment or shoe that we know doesn't fit properly," says Dumas. (Customers invariably thank them later).

At Bon Lieu, you'll find all the clothing and accessories you need for newborns through juniors in European high style and Canadian ruggedness at approachable prices. Highlighted by lines such as Baby Mini, IKKS, MiniMan and Esprit, each piece is carefully selected for its high ratio of quality to price.

At Petit Pied, the parade of name-brand high-fashion footwear (some 300 styles!) stretches further than the pitter-patter of countless little feet. Minibel from France, best known for its baby shoes with three thicknesses of removable insoles for a perfect fit, actually goes up to size 39 (equivalent to a ladies' size 9). Many Moms buy a pair for themselves to avoid being "overstepped". Designed in England and made in Italy, Buckle My Shoe (considered by Dumas to be "the world's finest children's shoe," offers a wide variety of styles, from two-toned buttery soft leathers to fancy shiny patents, all impeccably stitched and with virtually indestructible soles. France's #1 selling children's shoe Babybotte is available too, as is Trotty, a companion line for older children.

If your children like to be treated like royalty — we personally know a few who do — they'll feel right at home in Start Rite's, made by the official footwear supplier to the Queen of England. When the harsh reality of our Canadian winter hits home, they'll be happy to don a pair of Sorels by Kaufman, of which Petit Pied carries a complete selection. Moderately-priced footwear for all occasions from Right Step and Maniqui still offer the high quality and workmanship that is an absolute at Petit Pied.

Purchases of $250 or more at Petit Pied ($500 or more at Bon Lieu) are rewarded by a 20% discount on your next regular-price item purchased at the same location. It's one more reason to visit these immaculate boutiques and enjoy the service of retailers who know children's fashion inside and out and genuinely care for their customers.

Retired? Housing Alternatives Are Available

There comes a time in all of our lives, when our family leaves home and the house that once seemed too small, suddenly becomes too big. Many seniors choose a smaller home as they become busy with extended families, travelling, exploring new hobbies or simply taking it easy. Townhouses and condominiums are often an excellent alternative for this active age group. At some point, however, seniors may desire more from their home than just low maintenance living. This is especially true if an individual is living alone and looking for more social interaction than is provided in a condominium environment. Yet most people are not familiar with the excellent alternative of a full service retirement residence.

Residing in a full service retirement residence, seniors enjoy the comfort of their own private and spacious suite while enjoying the amenities, companionship, and services that are offered. One company leading the way in seniors' housing is International Care Corporation, a subsidiary of London Life and owner of Forest Hill Place — a Lifestyle Retirement Community. Forest Hill Place is conveniently located in the Bathurst area north of Eglinton Avenue close to public transit, shops, community services and medical offices. Forest Hill Place offers a choice of studio, one or deluxe one bedroom suites, and a full service package which includes dining, social programs, 24-hour reception and security, housekeeping and use of all amenities. Forest Hill Place is a predominantly Jewish community that offers fine Jewish cuisine, an activities program that includes a lecture series, cultural programs and quality entertainment. Even the most active and energetic seniors find the move to Forest Hill Place a welcome change as they are free to enjoy the life that they have worked and strived for.

Lifestyle Retirement Communities offer companionship and security.

Forest Hill Place gives residents the opportunity for support, security, choice, privacy and independence; the opportunity to continue old friendships while at the same time making new ones; and the knowledge that someone is always there should the need arise. As one resident comments, "A retirement residence is the last place I thought I'd be because I thought I was too young. But moving here was one of the best decisions I've made in my life and I should have done it sooner."

Forest Hill Place also has the strength of being part of the Lifestyle Retirement Communities family of 14 residences across Canada in Ontario, Manitoba and British Columbia.

For futher information on Forest Hill Place, please call Marlene White at (416) 785-1511. For information on any other Lifestyle Retirement Community in Canada, please call Kerri Wyse collect at (604) 732-4760.

Cosmetic Surgery – A change for the better

MICHAEL J. BEDERMAN
M.D., F.R.C.S.(c) PLASTIC SURGEON

In this youth and fitness oriented society, with an increased awareness about positive self image, people want more control over their bodies.

Aesthetic Plastic Surgery is designed primarily to improve appearance, thereby enhancing self esteem. The increased interest in youth, beauty, and health has been a major influencing factor.

Cosmetic surgery is no longer a privilege reserved for the wealthy. Men and women, young and old, people from all walks of life are wanting to make a change for the better.

The Centre for Cosmetic Surgery is a self-contained surgical facility in mid-town Toronto where the latest in medical technology has been incorporated in a private and elegant setting.

The unique facility is a free standing, comprehensive centre for the exclusive practice of aesthetic plastic surgery.

The comprehensive consultation with Dr. Michael Bederman, the principal surgeon, is informative and by far the best way to find out what cosmetic procedure is appropriate for you. The advancement and improvement of surgical techniques has made the various procedures safer, with minimal pain and shorter recovery time.

Dr. Bederman has had an active practice in Toronto since 1975. He received his degree in Medicine at U. of T. in 1969, trained in Plastic Surgery in Montreal, Miami and New York and received his Specialist Certificate in Plastic Surgery in Toronto in 1974.

Dr. Bederman is often consulted and quoted in print and television media and is a frequent lecturer and speaker.

A member of the Canadian Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, Dr. Bederman holds membership in many other Canadian, American and International Societies. He also continues to practice Plastic and Reconstructive surgery at the Scarborough General Hospital.

The Centre for Cosmetic Surgery also operates as a resource information facility which provides video tapes and printed materials on all the latest procedures. We offer a relaxed, elegant atmosphere for post-operative recovery. Private nurses are available for overnight patient stay at the Centre. Nurses are registered with the College of Nurses of Ontario.

From your initial consultation to your final post-op. visit, our staff will attentively guide you every step of the way.

They bring their knowledge, enthusiasm and sincerity to our patients, always happy to take the time to answer any related questions or concerns.

Impact Insurance: Reliability and Continuity

Sam Wasser has spent over 40 years in the insurance business, starting as a life agent with London Life in 1954. In 1962 he founded S.M. Wasser Insurance selling all types of general insurance as well as life products.

In January 1994, Sam and his two sons, Howard and Wayne, formed Impact Insurance Brokers Inc. Growth since then has been unprecedented. The number of employees, and the space occupied by the firm, have doubled; and the number of associates, all of whom are brokers, has increased to 15.

Sam ascribes this growth partly to the knowledge and experience he has gained during 4 decades and partly to the contacts he has built up. These qualities have kept Impact competitive through difficult times. Also, he points out, with fewer insurance companies serving a greater number of clients, Impact has taken up some of the business left by companies which are no longer operating.

Impact represents the leading companies in the industry. The office has 2 distinct sections, 1 for financial services and 1 for general insurance, using its expertise to give total service in both fields.

Sam Wasser is a man of varied experience and strong community involvement. During Israel's War of Independence, he was a member of Mahal, the English-Canadian volunteer unit which became the 7th Brigade. (This is the unit which was headed by Ben Dunkelman, author of Dual Loyalties.) Sam is also a founding member of Beth Tikvah.

"The key to long-term success in insurance," Sam believes, "is reliability, continuity, and a personal relationship with the client." Business is about facts, figures and the bottom line; but it's also about people and service. Long-term clients, he says, are like good friends.

Impact's offices are located at 1600 Steeles Ave. West, Suite 214, in Concord. Telephone (416) 492-5335 or (905) 660-6170.

Jewish Contemporary Singles ... A new beginning

To celebrate 10 years of successful matchmaking, we are pleased to announce that Jewish Contemporary Singles is having a NEW BEGINNING!

The company has been purchased by JENNIFER SHARPE, a well-known and popular Wedding Consultant in the Toronto area. Jennifer has a degree from U of T in Sociology with special emphasis on interpersonal relations. Her 6 years as a Wedding Consultant have allowed her to meet many men and women in the Jewish Community. These contacts will certainly enhance J.C.S.'s client base.,

Jennifer is redirecting the company and returning to a PERSONAL APPROACH. Jennifer will consult with each new member to get detailed information about who they are and what they are hoping for in a mate. Jennifer's approach to matchmaking is "warm and casual" — almost the same as anyone you know (sibling, friend, relative) fixing you up. Just consider Jennifer as someone who knows a lot of people. She wants to eliminate any stigmas people may have about dating services by keeping the process as uninstitutional as possible.

Jennifer meets with each new member for about 45 minutes. People tell her "their story" — what they are looking for and what they're NOT looking for! As well, everyone fills out a detailed questionnaire. This system is unlike any others. The superficial process of looking at pictures and reading biographies (which may or may not be accurate) is NOT how Jewish Contemporary Singles works. What you CAN expect from Jennifer is a phone call (as often as an appropriate date is found) giving you details about someone Jennifer feels is suitable for you. No telephone numbers are exchanged until BOTH parties have OK'd the date. Jennifer is "a bit old-fashioned" so she usually gives the man the woman's phone number and asks him to make the first move. After the date, Jennifers likes feedback from the individuals so she knows how to guide her selections for the next time.

Jewish Contemporary Singles has only been under Jennifer's management since May 1, 1995 but we are already enjoying success! Several matches have been made — sometimes on Jennifer's first try! People really seem to be responding to this new way of doing things and they feel comfortable going out on a date with someone whom they know someone else has met and is familiar with.

As always, fees continue to be reasonable. You can be on your way to meeting that special someone, hand-picked just for you. Let our NEW BEGINNING be a NEW BEGINNING for you. Call today! (416) 484-9733. This service remains STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL!

CFL punter consistently among league's best

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What's wrong with this picture?

Last year, rookie kicker Josh Miller led the CFL in punting, averaging 42.9 yards per kick, and was miserable.

Earlier this season, the Baltimore Stallions' punter trailed Hamilton's Paul Osbaldiston in the punting derby, but was wearing a smile and feeling good about himself.

At a pads-less practice at Hamilton's Ivor Wynne Stadium recently, Miller explained the difference in attitude between this year and last.

Last season, he was unexpectedly called by a Baltimore coach and invited to try out for the team after a year away from football.

Miller gladly took up the offer and won a spot with the no-names. Trouble was, he hadn't been expecting to play pro ball and arrived in terrible shape, about 20 pounds overweight and "built like a pear."

Even though he was booming the ball high and far, he believed that all anybody could see was an out-of-shape kicking specialist who could barely run across the field.

This year, he came to camp a svelt 215 pounds on a six-foot-three frame, looking the part of a pro athlete. In addition, he's worked on his technique and though he sometimes sacrifices distance in his kicks, he's booting them higher than before, giving Stallions' head coach Don Matthews the "hang-time" he demands.

After 13 games, Miller boasted a 47.4 yard average and had passed Osbaldiston to become the number one punter in the league.

And he's improving on his consistency. Twenty-four of his first 67 punts have gone more than 50 yards and only 11 have been under 40.

Despite earning a living as a pro football player and appearing in the Grey Cup in his rookie season, Miller admits to being a little puzzled by the path his career has taken.

He began as a place-kicker in high school in East Brunswick, N.J., and then moved to Arizona for the golf, but in 1989 he was named All-American kicker at Scottsdale Community College.

His first shot as a punter came at Arizona State after the team's punter almost caught his own kick in the air. The coach approached Miller to give punting a shot. He took to it naturally and in 1992, he was named first team All-American with an average of 42.7 yards on 74 punts. He also made All Pac-10.

Though not drafted, he attended the Green Bay Packers' camp as a free agent but was cut.

Thinking his football career over, Miller got work as a model and an actor and explored a career in communications. When he had some time off, he could be found on a Scottsdale golf course, trying to whittle down his five handicap.

Then last season he got the phone call from Baltimore and his football career resumed.

Miller said he is mostly self-taught (with help from St. Louis' Sean Landeta) and since college, he's strived for consistency and control. In Matthews' system, the single point is to be avoided and he's under orders to try to place the ball out of bounds when deep in the other team's zone.

Miller loves the fast-paced action of the CFL and though "it was NFL, NFL, NFL," when he was growing up, "I'm thankful I'm able to wear a helmet. The idea that they pay you to play a game is the best thing since lox."

Josh Miller prepares to hoist one high and long at a recent Stallions practice in Hamilton. [Paul Lungen photo]

Despite the modest wages CFLers are paid, Miller, who's single, said he's managing to put some aside. "I'm not a flashy guy," he said, adding his expenses are modest.

His family is fully supportive of his pro football career. His father, Richard, who commuted to work in the garment trade in New York City every morning at 6 a.m. returning at 9 p.m., "told me to do something you love," Miller said.

His father has travelled often to Baltimore to watch Josh play.

"If there was a rock-skipping contest in Alaska, he'd go to it," Miller said.

Envoy stresses benefits of investment in Israel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The new year brings a new Israeli consul general to Toronto and a new trade commissioner.

The international accounting firm Price Waterhouse recently hosted a cocktail reception at the Sheraton Hotel to welcome Jehudi Kinar, who took up the post of consul general at the beginning of September, and to introduce Yael Varsano-Barzilay, the new Israeli consul to Canada for economic affairs (trade commissioner).

At the reception, Price Waterhouse announced the establishment of an Israeli practice team led by Eric Slavens and Sheldon Lerman, following the addition of Somekh Chaikin, one of Israel's largest public accounting firms, to Price Waterhouse's worldwide organization earlier this year.

"There is growing interest in doing business with Israel," Robert D. Brown, chair and CEO of Price Waterhouse Canada, told some 120 people in attendance.

"The peace process has accelerated investment," Kinar said. In the last two years there has been intense investment activity in Israel by big multi-national companies.

Kinar said one of his goals is to strengthen economic ties between Israel and Canada by establishing more partnerships and joint ventures.

He said he does not believe the strong opposition to the current peace process expressed by some groups in the Diaspora reflects the views of the majority of people.

Varsano-Barzilay said she's come to Canada at an exciting time, because a free trade agreement between Canada and Israel could be finalized in 1996.

Dignitaries at the reception included Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick, MPP Isabel Bassett and former External Affairs minister Barbara McDougall. Gad M. Somekh, the managing partner of Somekh Chaikin Israel, was also present.

At the reception are (from left) Price Waterhouse Israel liaison Eric Slavens; Jehudi Kinar, consul general of Israel; Gad Somekh, managing partner of Somekh Chaiken, Israel; and Robert Brown, chairman and senior partner of Price Waterhouse Canada.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Waxman To Direct Play: Four Canadian actors were recently cast in David Margulies' award-winning 1992 play Sight Unseen, which opens Oct. 18 at the Ford Centre For the Performing Arts Studio Theatre in North York.

Set in the glittering international art world, the play explores an artist's passion, integrity and betrayal. The director is Al Waxman and the producer Janese Kane, the artistic team that brought us last year's worthy A Shayna Maidel.

"I'm drawn to Sight Unseen because it is an inventively structured play driven by the reunion and confrontation of four fully drawn characters," says Waxman. "The play probes the depths of these characters with sensitivity, perception, wit and heat." Reservations, 416-872-2222.

Harbourfront Authors: The 16th annual International Festival of Authors at Toronto's Harbourfront features an impressive list of literary luminaries — too many to recite here. As in previous years, the Jewish interest is well served through the presence of such authors as Ariel Dorfman of Chile, Thomas Keneally of Australia, Arnost Lustig of Czechoslovakia and the United States, Grace Paley of the United States, Mordecai Richler and Josef Skvorecky of Montreal and Toronto respectively, and the renowned Russian poet and novelist Yevgeny Yevtushenko.

On-stage interviewers of authors include Phyllis Grosskurth, Michele Landsberg, David Lewis Stein and Rhea Tregebov. For a fuller sampling of the festival's multicultural riches, call 416-973-3000 or 416-973-4000.

Two Plays Evoke WWII: A production of playwright Jean Anouilh's version of the Sophoclean drama Antigone is being readied for performance by My Noble Kinsman Productions, with a theatrical run set for Oct. 6 to 22 at The Theatre Centre East, 142 George St., Toronto.

The backdrop of Anouilh's drama is Greece, the cradle of political democracy, as it was ravaged by Italian, Bulgarian and German forces in the early 1940s. 416-538-0988.

Meanwhile, women, war, the devil and jazz are central elements of Equity Showcase Theatre's production of The Dawns are Quiet Here, by Boris Vassiliev, previewing Oct. 18 at the Harbourfront Studio Theatre, Toronto.

Ensemble acting, period music, and a mix of dramatic styles are used to explore the propaganda that fuels the sacrifices and euphoria of war. Until Oct. 28. 416-533-6100.

Jewish Hour Revisited

Beginning in the 1930s and lasting for three decades, thousands of people turned their radio dials every Sunday at 10 a.m. to the Harry Harris Jewish Hour.

Now you can join Gloria Valentine and Murray Ellis, along with pianist Nina Shapilsky, for a nostalgic stroll through songs, skits, authentic announcements and social events of the day, on Oct. 1, 7:30 p.m. at the Central Library Auditorium at the North York City Centre, 5120 Yonge St.

Tickets are $5 available from Lasting Impressions, at the Bathurst Manor Plaza on 243 Wilmington Ave. Or call 635-0720.

Keaton comedy full of pathos

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

In her debut as a director in Unstrung Heroes, Diane Keaton brings us a comedy tinged with tragedy and pathos.

It's about an eccentric Jewish family, the likes of which Hollywood revels in. Keaton takes this promising material and shapes it into a movie that, while not compelling, nevertheless holds your attention.

The Lidz clan is a screenwriter's dream come true. Sid Lidz (John Turturro) is a wacky inventor who may as well be from another planet. His brothers, Danny (Michael Richards) and Arthur (Maury Chaykin), are dysfunctional and paranoic bachelors.

When Sid's wife (Andie MacDowell) is afflicted with a devastating illness, their son Steven (Nathan Watt) convinces them that he is better off staying with his uncles Danny and Arthur, who live in a dark apartment filled to the rafters with old newspapers and a collection of balls.

Danny and Arthur are strange birds. Danny spends much of his waking hours fending off delusional conspiracies and ranting on about supposedly anti-Semitic politicians. Arthur, timid and perpetually dishevelled, is an obsessive collector of useless bric-a-brac.

Yet Danny and Arthur aren't completely cut off from the real world. They find a measure of solace in Judaism, sporting yarmulkes and reciting prayers during meals. And they encourage Steven to be himself.

Being a secular Jew, Sid is hardly thrilled by Steven's dalliance with religion. Nor is he happy with his decision to change his first name to Franz.

These conflicts, which are expertly set up and humanely resolved, unfold as Selma gradually succumbs to her terminal case of cancer.

The film, which is currently playing in Canadian theatres, is neither excessively saccharine nor contrived. The dramatic components click into place, producing a movie that appeals to all age groups.

The actors acquit themselves with aplomb, although MacDowell appears too luminous for a woman with one foot already in the grave.

RE broker helps house stars

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Real estate broker Marilyn Rothman, who specializes in long-term leasing and short-term luxury residential rentals, has stars in her eyes.

With the booming of the film industry in Toronto, such production companies as Alliance Productions Ltd. and Twentieth Century Fox have turned to her to find homes away from homes for a number of directors and movie stars.

"Stars such as Whoopi Goldberg and Kirstie Alley have filmed in Toronto recently and because they are here for a few months, they want a comfortable 'homey' home for themselves and their family," Rothman says.

Leases of this nature fill a niche for owners who want to rent their homes for a short period of time. "I deal with a range of properties from deluxe to exclusive, located in areas such as Rosedale and Forest Hill. Rental range is generally from $1,500 to $25,000 a month."

Rothman screens potential tenants in order to match the right tenant with the right home. "A Cabbagetown home could be perfect for a single person or couple but not right for a family. A family may want to be in a residential neighborhood while someone filming here in the summer may want to live on the waterfront.

"I work for the homeowner and I introduce who I feel is the right tenant to the owner to negotiate a lease. It is a job to find the perfect match. In the case of homeowners, that means achieving the best market rent and having a tenant that respects the property. In the case of the renter, it is finding the right property for the specific duration of time that is needed."

She says that while she specializes in areas such as Yorkville, North Toronto, St. Clair/Yonge, Rosedale, Forest Hill and the Lakefront, she also operates a referral network with other real estate specialists, in order to find potential properties throughout the city, in the country and in locations outside of Toronto. Prospective clients come from around the globe.

Interim accord with Palestinians said near

Those reports said the agreement will call for the building of bypass roads for the 415 Jewish residents of Hebron; joint Israeli-Palestinian patrols in Hebron; maintaining the status quo at the Caves of Machpelah; and keeping Rachel's Tomb under Israeli control.

The deal also makes clear that security for Jewish settlers will be handled by Israeli patrols only, reports said.

Earlier last week, after 50 hours of talks, Israel agreed to enlarge the areas that will be transfered to Palestinians in order to provide "territorial continuity" between the West Bank towns of Ramallah, Nablus, Tulkarm, Kalkilya and Jenin.

As well, Israel has agreed to the stationing of 250 to 300 Palestinian municipal workers in Hebron. Only some of them will be allowed to carry weapons. The PA had demanded that 500 armed police be stationed in Hebron.

According to a revised Israeli proposal on Hebron, the IDF will redeploy in the city, leaving certain Arab neighborhoods.

All-night talks between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PA chairman Yasser Arafat focused on the last two outstanding issues: Hebron and maps detailing the redeployment of Israel Defence Force troops.

Peres and the Israeli delegation rejected Arafat's claim that Israeli was trying to "cantonize" the West Bank, explaining that certain roads which will remain in Israeli hands are essential.

The PA requested 35 changes to the maps after objecting to continued IDF authority over many West Bank roads, which the PA charged was aimed at isolating Palestinian villages within Israeli-controlled territory.

The maps issue was finally settled, but not before Arafat stormed out of a session because one chart showed an Israeli bypass road running between two Palestinian villages.

Dear Jesse,

I am 76 years-old and very frightened.

My husband died three years ago and my brothers and sister died in the concentration camps during the war. I don't know how I survived.

I live by myself in what used to be a Jewish neighborhood; now I'm not sure who all these people are. Many nights I can't sleep because I have bad dreams. I don't go out when it's dark or when the weather is bad. I am so alone, my friends are sick and my child lives far away.

B.L.

Dear B. L.,

It would be a good idea for you to speak to your family doctor about your lack of sleep. Loneliness and isolation often lead to other problems.

Call a local synagogue and speak to the rabbi or Jewish Family Services where you might ask for someone who works with seniors.

In Montreal, JSSE provides a support group where survivors of the Holocaust have the opportunity to express their thoughts and learn a variety of ways to cope such as relaxation exercises. This group has been effective. If your community is interested in developing a similar program, please contact us.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Oslo 2: autonomy and security

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — If Israeli leaders were expecting a strong reaction from the Israeli public to the Washington signing of the Interim Agreement, they were in for a surprise.

Israeli and Palestinian officials announced just hours before the start of Rosh Hashanah that an agreement for extending West Bank autonomy had been reached.

But many Israelis didn't learn of the Interim Agreement, known here as Oslo II, until the end of the two-day holiday, leaving little time to organize rallies, for or against the agreement.

Israeli public opinion, according to the latest opinion polls, is about evenly split over the agreement. On Sept. 27, a day after Rosh Hashanah, hundreds of people demonstrated under the banner of Zo Artzeinu, or This is our Land, a right-wing group that in the past has mobilized thousands of demonstrators across the country.

Although sporadic demonstrations snarled traffic in the capital and elsewhere, it was a far cry from the massive outpourings of anti-government sentiment that have taken place recently.

The greatest display of disaffection took place among West Bank settlers, particularly in Hebron.

Last Friday, a day after the Sept. 28 Washington signing ceremony, settler leaders announced they would form a voluntary militia to patrol the West Bank when Israel begins redeploying its troops there under the terms of the Interim Agreement.

And Saturday, about 100 settlers marched through the streets of Hebron shouting "This is Our Land" and "Slaughter the Arabs." Two settlers were detained after they threw stones at Palestinians, Army Radio reported

On Sunday, more than 100 Israelis from Jordan Valley farming settlements protested at the Allenby Bridge crossing into Jordan, charging that the Interim Agreement was abandoning them to Palestinian rule.

Traffic was stopped for hours until Israeli police dragged the settlers away from the bridge entrance, located just outside the Palestinian self-rule enclave in Jericho.

In Jerusalem, there was little evidence of high-pitched emotions.

According to the latest poll published in the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot, 51 per cent opposes it. Given the poll's four per cent margin of error, the results represent a statistical dead heat.

While the scene on the streets here was relatively low-key, the Israeli press was rife with commentary.

Reaction was predictable, depending on the newspaper's predisposition to the peace process as a whole.

The right-wing daily Hatzofeh, an organ of the National Religious Party, blasted the agreement in an editorial as the "Rabin government's document of surrender" to PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Editorialists for the Israeli daily Ma'ariv wrote that to the credit of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, the Interim Agreement "does not create irreversible facts in three areas: responsibility for security, the fate of the settlements and the future of Jerusalem."

The newspaper also said that "less than one-third of Judea and Samaria, including the cities of the West Bank, is being given to Arafat," and that "if the agreement founders, Israel will hold the

'So much is at stake'

By IRVING ABELLA
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Agatha Christie once remarked that her favorite husband was her second, an archeologist. And for a good reason.

"The older I got," she explained, "the more interesting to him I became." And so it is with Canada. The older we get, the more interesting we become.

A few years ago the New Republic described Canada as the most boring country in the world. No one would dare say that today. We have in fact become a very interesting country — perhaps too interesting — not only because of the occasional violent native uprisings or the dramatic fish wars in our coastal waters, but most significantly because of the increasingly fractious political struggles which are threatening to destroy the country.

Referendum Quebec

With the end of the Cold War and the creation of new ominous trading blocs, while other countries are girding themselves to confront new global problems, Canada must take time out to discover whether she is in fact a nation.

How sad. What a colossal waste of time and energy. Does anyone really think that the October referendum will solve anything? How can it? We have already been told that it won't. The leaders of the sovereigntists' side have gleefully vowed that if they lose, they will try again — and again and again — as many times as it takes to wear down the federalist forces. At the same time, the prime minister has been sending out clear signals that a Yes vote will not necessarily be binding on the rest of Canada.

CANADA

CIC Supports Accord

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) has welcomed the latest agreement between Israel and the Palestinians.

Last Thursday's signing of Phase II of the Oslo accords "is another important step in the historic process of reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians, and toward the achievement of the enduring Israeli goal of peace and normalized relations with its Arab neighbors," CIC national chair Stephen Victor said in a release.

"While we recognize that there is still much uncertainty about how the arrangements will evolve, this agreement reinforces the message that both parties are determined to move forward despite attempts to derail the peace process," the statement added.

'Aryan' Arrested

CHILLIWACK, B.C. — Charles Scott, who set up a telephone hate line here and was hounded out of Kelowna when he moved there with his family before heading to Ontario, has been arrested for trespassing on a Canadian Forces base and obstructing police. The trial has been set for Nov. 1.

Meanwhile, Scott, named "Aryan of the Year" by a U.S.-based hate group, faces trial in Kelowna for public mischief.

Centre Opening Set

VANCOUVER — Impresario Garth Drabinsky's newest enterprise, Vancouver's Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, is scheduled for opening and dedication on Nov. 2.

The theatre, designed by Israeli-born architect Moshe Safdie, is located at 777 Homer St., in the city's downtown core.

The opening production will be Showboat. The Vancouver chapter of the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University will sponsor a Dec. 1 performance.

Mother, Daughter Feted

HAMILTON — A mother and daughter from a small Ontario community were the honorees at a recent State of Israel Bonds Women's Division luncheon.

Lena Rothberg and her daughter Beverley Lasky, both of Branford, Ont., were feted before over 200 guests at Beth Jacob Synagogue.

Representing the third generation — Lasky's eldest daughter Naomi — said mother and grandmother are "an inspiration to all of their children and grandchildren."

ISRAEL

Israel's Population

JERUSALEM — The Central Bureau of Statistics announced last week that Israel's population stands at slightly less than 5.6 million.

The Jewish population grew by more than 100,000, to 4.5 million people.

Jews comprise 81 per cent of the population; Arabs, 14.5 per cent; Christians, 2.9 per cent; and Druze, 1.7 per cent.

Some 82,000 immigrants — 70,000 of them from the former Soviet Union — arrived in Israel during the past 12 months.

Extradition Request

JERUSALEM — The police last week submitted an updated request for the extradition of Hamas leader Musa Abu Marzook, being held by the United States.

The request is based on additional material gathered since the original request was issued in July.

Israel decided to ask for the extradition of the former leader of the Hamas political bureau after he entered the U.S., where he resides.

Abu Marzook is believed to have coordinated Hamas terror attacks against Israeli targets over the last several years.

Auction Outcry

TEL AVIV — An auction house here has again caused a public outcry over its planned sale of Nazi memorabilia.

Knesset Speaker Shevach Weiss and Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau denounced plans by Menashe Maridek, owner of Zodiac Stamps, to sell items from the Nazi era.

Israel Radio reported that emblems and insignia worn by the Nazi SS appeared in Zodiac Stamps' catalogue for a public sale, scheduled to take place next month.

Five months ago, the auction house caused a stir with its plans to sell artifacts from the Nazi death camps, including a bar of soap allegedly made from human fat.

That sale was cancelled in the wake of public pressure.

WORLD

Street Name Shelved

ROME — The mayor of Rome has shelved his plan to rename a street for a leading official in Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini's government.

After pressure from Jewish and left-wing groups, Mayor Francesco Rutelli this month announced his decision — which came after the city's council's 11-1 vote backing the idea — saying that the "unshakable moral opposition" to the plan by Rome's Jews had been a decisive factor.

The mayor had defended his idea of naming the street for former education minister Giuseppe Bottai, who signed laws ordering Jews out of Italy's schools, as a way for Italians to come to terms with their fascist past.

Nazi Laws Recalled

NUREMBERG — This German city recently commemorated the 60th anniversary of the passing of the Nuremberg Laws, which formed the basis for the anti-Semitic policies of the Nazi regime.

Nuremberg Mayor Peter Schoenlein pledged some $50,000 to the Jewish National Fund to plant saplings near Beersheva.

Immigration Questioned

BONN — The head of Germany's Jewish community says he opposes immigrants from the former Soviet Union coming to Germany under the rubric of Judaism, when their Jewish background is questionable.

"I have nothing against opening Germany's doors to refugees," said Ignatz Bubis, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

But, he added, "I don't want anyone blaming us for unlawful immigration."

Of the 100,000 people in the former Soviet Union who have applied for visas to Germany as Jewish "refugees," some 40,000 have come to Germany. Bubis said that only half of these immigrants are halachically Jewish, meaning they have a Jewish mother.

Walter Haas Dies

SAN FRANCISCO — Walter A. Haas Jr., the longtime Levi Strauss & Co. executive, philanthropist and former Oakland Athletics owner, died of cancer Sept. 20 in his San Francisco home. He was 79.

Nine hundred people, including the mayors of San Francisco and Oakland, several current and former Oakland As and former secretary of state George Shultz, attended the funeral.

Haas supported hundreds of civic and cultural causes, including several Jewish organizations.

Calls for Resignation

WELLINGTON — A city councillor in New Zealand published an anti-Semitic booklet that has outraged the country's Jewish community and elicited calls for his resignation.

Cliff Tait, a member of Hamilton's city council, writes in the booklet The Squeeze is On that there is a Jewish conspiracy to control the world.

Dov Bing, a member of the New Zealand Jewish Council, has called on the Hamilton city council to "collectively call upon Mr. Tait to tender his resignation."

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which "help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair."

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. "The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5. regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5. which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Seniors anxious over budget cutbacks

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cuts in health and welfare services in Ontario implemented or forecast by the government of Premier Mike Harris are causing deep concern to some members of the Toronto Jewish community.

"Eighty per cent of our members will be in deep trouble," said Harold Segal, past chair of the Bernard Betel Centre's social action committee. About 2,500 people belong to or use the centre.

The Throne Speech delivered Sept. 27 confirmed cuts already known, but what has distressed many is the prediction by government officials that the current program of free drugs for seniors and welfare recipients will be changed.

Another concern is the statement by Ontario Health Minister Jim Wilson that health and hospital services will be "deeply restructured," and a report that seven Metro hospitals will be closed.

One of the seven is Branson Hospital in North York, which has more Jewish patients than any other in Metro, including Mount Sinai.

Jack Gallop, president and CEO of Branson, said he is "surprised" his hospital is on the list.

"On any given day here, our community and patient mix has 65 per cent to 70 per cent over the age of 65 and being a community hospital in close proximity to seniors is very significant," he said.

The other hospitals on the hit list are Women's College, Wellesley, Western, Runnymede, Central and Northwestern.

"The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is anxious about the impact of budget cuts," the Federation said in a press release, quoting Morris Zbar, director of community planning and allocations.

Federation funded agencies, according to Zbar, are already operating with less money and are continuing to "cut deeply at their expenses." However, he added, "there's much more government budget trimming to come and the community will not be able to replace tax-based government funding."

Said Zbar: "We need to impress upon them [government officials] the importance of distinctly Jewish service delivery."

"I have paid taxes all my life and I'm still paying taxes," said 81-year-old Lou Goldenberg, director of the Betel Centre's public forums, expressing anger at the government cuts directed at seniors.

"I would like younger people to realize that we are not getting services out of the goodness of their hearts."

Protests against cuts in Wheel-Trans services have been directed to the Ontario government by Sadie Rose and Alec Bellan, co-chairs of the Betel social action committee.

Renovating Cummer Lodge

Recent Russian immigrant members at Betel are worried about the cuts but are hesitant to sign petitions addressed to the government, because in their former homeland, that was not allowed, explained Gregory Veprinski, Russian Golden Age president.

The 422 residents of Cummer Lodge, about one-third of whom are Jewish, have a special concern over Ontario government funding. Because of a threat that Metro would withdraw its $22.5-milllion share of the $45.7-million cost of renovating the lodge if its revenues are cut, a Metro committee has decided to postpone a decision on whether to privatize Cummer.

This has led Mayor Mel Lastman of North York to threaten to close the lodge as unsafe and a fire hazard if renovations are not made.

Support groups help families of gays, lesbians

By JANICE ARNOLD AND FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporters

TORONTO — For more Jewish families than one might imagine, the High Holy Days are the catalyst prompting a loved one to reveal that he or she is gay.

"People are asking for forgiveness and atoning for sins. Families are together, and you can't take the hypocrisy [of pretending to be someone you're not]. It's a very intense time," said a Toronto woman who came out to her family several years ago.

But when children come out of the closet, parents often go into it, says Mark Mazer, one of two social workers who lead an annual 10-week session for parents of Jewish gay and lesbian children in Montreal.

The group — one of only two of its kind in Canada — was launched in 1992 under the auspices of Yakhdav, a local organization for Jewish homosexuals. Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom provides space for the group's meetings. (Originally it met at Shaare Zion, a Conservative congregation.)

"The main purpose [of the group] is to help parents deal with their feelings after finding out their child is gay or lesbian, said Mazer, a Yakhdav member. Over half the participants continue to meet on their own after the 10 weeks are over.

Participants are given information on homosexuality, but mostly the group provides a place where parents can talk and share their emotions.

At one session, the temple's Rabbi Leigh Lerner addresses the biblical perspective on homosexuality and how Judaism today is dealing with the phenomenon.

In Toronto, a support group meets monthly at Holy Blossom Temple. Meetings are facilitated on a rotating basis by members whose experience has brought them a measure of understanding and acceptance.

It's not uncommon for sons or daughters to check out the group with their parents in mind and end up staying for support themselves. In the process they often contribute to other participants' understanding of their own children's situation.

Syd and Eva (not their real names) are longstanding members of the group. When their lesbian daughter came out to them seven years ago, there were no Jewish support groups to which they could turn, and they attended meetings of Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays (PFLAG) in a church on the outskirts of the city.

A long and difficult process

The couple facilitated a recent meeting at Holy Blossom using a combination of humor, questions, suggestions and empathy.

The CJN attended the meeting under the condition that confidentiality would be respected.

"Coming out [as parents] was a very long and difficult process, especially the first four years," recalls Syd.

As a facilitator, he says "it feels good to share our experiences and see people come along so fast."

One mother of a gay son said that she never considered herself the type to go to a group, but finds it helpful to learn how others have coped with her situation.

Initially, parents go through "almost a mourning process," says Eva. "It's like the child you thought you had is not the same person. You have to get to know this new person."

In Montreal, said Mazer, many parents come to the support group "in pain, wanting help. It's remarkable to see the transformation by the end of the session. They are set free, and have become proud and supportive of their children."

Construction halts on controversial club

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Construction of the Luxor night club on Dufferin Street, opposite Bathurst Manor, has been halted by an interim control bylaw passed by North York council Sept. 20.

"It gives us 12 months to study what the parking situation should be for a place so large it can accommodate as many people as the O'Keefe Centre," said Coun. Mike Feldman who introduced the motion council adopted.

The Luxor management says they will have 176 parking spaces of their own but have permission of nearby businesses for another 800 spaces.

"Nearby residents are opposed to this development and this gives us a breathing space to look at the whole situation," Feldman said.

Luxor's application for a liquor licence will be heard at a deferred public hearing Oct. 24 at North York City Hall at 10 a.m.

The Sept. 20 bylaw halting construction came after the owner of the club, Marc Hazout, took the city to court to force it to issue a building permit.

Hazout told The CJN earlier (Sept. 21) that he has spent $1.5 million already on renovating the former Idomo warehouse at the corner of Steeprock Drive and Dufferin Street and planned to spend a total of $3 million.

Hazout believes the opposition to his club is politically motivated. He says he has been acting in good faith and his plans meet all city requirements. "There are other clubs nearby," Hazout said. "Why are they permitted to exist?"

The staff of North York's planning and transportation departments will do an in-depth study of parking facilities at large night clubs in the Metro area, Feldman said. "I understand one club in Etobicoke that can accommodate 1,100 people has 550 parking spaces."

Feldman said the bylaw permitting a club in the area did not envision a night club. "If this was in a different location and had more parking; I would support it."

Jewish groups disagree about CHUM apology

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress believes CHUM Radio has still not sufficiently repudiated the anti-Semitic comments of radio personality Brian Henderson, despite adopting an anti-racism program for all its staff.

"We feel that CHUM must make a public statement describing why Henderson's statement was anti-Semitic and repudiate it," said Manuel Prutschi, executive director for Congress' Ontario region.

"The nature of the comments was so grave that it demanded a strong response," he added.

However Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada (BB), said "We're very pleased" with the approach adopted by CHUM. "We found [CHUM Radio president] Jim Waters was very agreeable to our recommendations."

After meeting with B'nai Brith officials, CHUM agreed to allow the Jewish organization to present race relations seminars for all its staff and to air hundreds of BB public service announcements over the next several years. CHUM will also co-sponsor the Student Human Rights Award of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

While not disputing the value of race relations seminars, Prutschi maintained that a public on-air repudiation of Henderson's commentary was still needed.

"You don't need seminars to realize that Henderson's commentary was anti-Semitic and needs to be repudiated. You don't need a course for that," Prutschi said.

Neither Prutschi nor Dimant would agree with suggestions the Jewish community's message was being diluted by two advocacy groups pursuing different approaches to the Henderson incident.

The focus should be on the anti-Semitic incident, not about the organizations' different views, Prutschi said.

Having two organizations responding to such an event strengthens the community, Dimant argued. "There's room in our community for diversity," he added.

The controversy was touched off when Henderson made an on-air commentary in which he said Jewish mothers were responsible for Ontario's Legal Aid crisis by pushing their sons into becoming lawyers.

Dick Smyth, a commentator for 680 News, came to Henderson's defence, saying there was a "disproportionate" number of Jewish lawyers.

Although 680 News readily acknowledged the anti-Semitic nature of Smyth's remarks, CHUM's initial apology simply denied Henderson was an anti-Semite.

Congress has filed a complaint about Henderson's statement with the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission, the broadcast regulator.
